A breeze has been made in paper manufacturing circles lately, more particularly at the South, by the appearance of a recent edition of the New Orleans Picayune printed on paper made of bagasse. This material is the refuse of the sugar cane after the juice has been squzzed out. Quite recently it has begun to be utilized in a small way for fuel, but it has previously been considered a worthless material and only a source of expense in carting it off to dumping grounds where it was burned.

Experiments to utilize bagasse in paper making have been considered for a long time, but it is not until very lately a New Orleans man—Mr. Harang—has made the claim of practically solving the problem. A lot of bagasse was shipped to a paper mill in Canada and 5.000 pounds of paper made. It was rather more brittle and darker than most newspaper but was, nevertheless serviceable paper material. Whether its production will pay is another question. Paper stock of all kinds, rags, wood pulp, jute butts, were never so low as now and the cost of paper making has been reduced by this course to such low figures that we have ceased to buy foreign paper, but instead export largely.

Ground wood pulp can doubtless be made cheaper than bagasse paper material, but enthusiasts believe there is a field for it. At least it would seem as though bagasse might be profitably used in the manufacture of tubs, barrels, dishes and such articles. An effort is being made to raise a working capital of $100,000 with which to erect a first-class pulp and paper mill.

The effort is a commendable one. It is possible that it may result in a new industry for the South of like nature as the cotton-seed oil manufacture. It is only a few years ago that thousands of tons of cotton seed were dumped into rivers to get it out of the way. The discovery of a process of obtaining oil from the cotton seed has built up an immense industry, which is to-day the leading manufacturing business of New Orleans.

A Battle with an Alligator.

A trapper and hunter, while trapping for otter on West Choctawpatchie River, in Alabama, had a terrible fight with an alligator. Seeing the water agitated in a hole near the river, and supposing that otters were fishing therein, he mounted a pole on a tussock just about the water's edge. His steel traps were in a sack suspended from his neck. His only weapon was his hatchet. He sat on the pole with a mass of vines at his back, he held his weapon ready to strike an otter should one arise. Soon he saw a young alligator near him. He caught it up and it uttered a cry. In an instant there was a terrible splash of water, and a huge alligator with distended mouth and glittering teeth rushed for him. With little hope of escape he fell back upon the vines, and as he did so kicked the pole from under his feet. The terrible jaws closed on the pole and crushed it. Carroll tried to interpose the traps, but a vine had caught them and partly held him down. Seizing his hatchet he struck into the open mouth of his assailant. It closed on the weapon, and with great difficulty he sav-

A FEW PICKLES.

Old Virginia Pickles.—Put up all the articles reserved for the pickle in a jar—tiny cucumbers, onions, cauliflowers cut in pieces, ears of young corn about an inch or two long, &c. Cover with boiling salt and water, allowing them to remain in it for forty-eight hours. Then take out of the water, place in a thick cloth, and expose to the sun to dry, turning them over occasionally. When thoroughly dry place them in a jar, cover with cold vinegar, to which has been added a small quantity of tumeric, to color them ; let them stand in this for two weeks to drain out the water and plump them ; then pour off this vinegar and add that made by the following recipe. In three months they will be fit for use.

Vinegar for Virginia Pickle.—One pound each of gingea, celery seeds, horseradish and mustard seed ; one ounce each of mace, nutmeg and of the long red peppers used in pickling. Put these spices into a stone jar or pot free from grease or anything that will impart an unpleasant oder to the vinegar ; pour over them two gallons of strong vinegar ; stir frequently, and allow to stand a year without using. After pouring off the vinegar for the pickles add more spices, and fill again for future use. Keep well covered. A superior pickle that repays time and expense of preparation, and will keep any length of time.

Pickled Lemons.—Cut the lemons in quarters, not entirely apart, and put a teaspoonful of salt in each one ; put them where they will dry, either in the hot sun or by the stove ; when they are so dried that they are black, and look good for nothing, prepare the vinegar with cloves, cinnamon, nutmeg, ginger root, onion and a little mustard seed, and pour it boiling hot over the lemons. Keep a year before using, when they will be found equal to the West India lime. They require more vinegar than other pickles, as the lemon swells to its natural size.

Leisure Hour Pickles.—Take a jar with a close lid or bung, and half fill it with the best and strongest cider vinegar ; then vegetables of all kind that come to hand, such as small beans, cauliflowers, radish pods, young cucumbers, onions, &c. ; throw them in taking care always that there is sufficient vinegar to cover them. When nearly full add mustard seeds, bruised ginger, shallots, whole peper, &c , to taste. Tie down tightly, and place the jar in a vessel of water over the stove until the articles are soft enough.

Pickled Cucumbers.—The best cucumbers for pickling are not larger than a man's thumb, and should be fresh gathered. Put young cucumbers in a jar and cover them with a brine made one part salt to four of boiling water, pour hot over the cucumbers, cover and let stand for twenty-four hours, and to every six cucumbers put one small white onion in the hot brine ; when you take the cucumbers from the brine wash them in cold water and vinegar, half and half ; wipe dry in a soft towel and put them back in the jar; make a pickle of—to every quart of vinegar, two ounces of brown sugar, two sticks of cinnamon, two pieces of mace, six cloves, two teaspoonsful of allspice, one of whole black pepper, one long pod of self good. A pair of shoes next went on, an unsuccessful search for a shoe-buttoner ending in the use of a hair-pin, and the vision at 5:55 was complete as to her foundation. When the clock struck 6 she was in the middle of a heated controversy with a corset, which had to be taken off and tightened, taken off and loosened, taken off and tightened again before she was entirely suited. Following the corset came an avalanche of white skirt that flew balloon-like into position and then nestled lovingly, beginning its evening work at exactly 6:10 P. M.

The vision now began the serious work of the evening; it took a damp towel and dabbled its face and neck there with all dried by pressure, not by rubbing and with a soft fluff of swansdown dusted the fair skin with powder—rather heavily the eye thought. Next the powder was rubbed off as carefully as it had been put on; the front hair was taken out of the papers in which it had been reposing, and a few careless passes of the comb clustered the yellow ringlets into a mast artistic bang upon the fair forehead, all of which was accomplished at 6:30 P. M.

Another white skirt, this time of lawn, went over the pretty head and down the supple waist, where it was fastened adroitly and shaken two or three times until it hit just that golden mean between too near and too far, which the ideal skirt upon the ideal girl should occupy. Of course this was not done without constant reference to the glass, and one or two liftings of the lower edge so that the wearer might with judicial accuracy calculate the effect of a neat blue upholstered ankle beneath that maze of white upon the masculine intellect. So the time passed until 6:50 P. M. Then the waist, also of diaphanous lawn, went on, the vision seeing to it that through its thin texture gleams from the pale, rosy shoulders and bosom should properly pass. Shrugs of the aforesaid shoulders and affectionate patting from the prettiest hands in St. Louis assisted in this process, bringing the day to 7:15 P. M. A collar of the minaret kind, and a haze of white lace went round the throat and were buttoned, pinned, and tied in ten minutes more. A bunch of artificial lilacs took five minutes to adjust, and the actual work of the toilet was done by 7:25 P. M., just three hours and fifteen minutes after it commenced. Ten minutes more, however, was devoted to criticism, the little form bending backward and forward before the pier glass into every possible position, studying the effect of the costume, which was, the eye thought, a thing of beauty and a joy forever.

She floated out of the room at 7:40 P. M., leaving the eye a wiser and a more wistful eye than it had been, and as it prepared to return to the body from which for nearly four hours it had been divorced, the eye moralized that those four hours had not been lost, and that, considering the time, the feminine result was superb.

ing his hatchet he struck into the open mouth of his assailant. It closed on the weapon, and with great difficulty he saved the hatchet. Getting free from his traps he dealt the alligator a fatal blow on the skull as it made the next charge. He secured the skull and such teeth as had not been destroyed in the fight. The length of the alligator was about 9½ feet. The hole was its den. Alligators rarely attack human beings.

The Wife

Ruskin, whose voice is that of a prophet, recalling men and women to those domestic ways in which pleasantness and peace are found, thus writes of the beautiful word "wife."

It is the great word in which the English and Latin languages conquered the French and Greek. I hope the French will some day get a word for it instead of femme.

But what do you think it comes from? The great value of the Saxon words is that they mean something. Wife means "weaver."

You must either be housewives or housemoths; remember that. In the deep sense you must either weave men's fortunes and embroider them, or feed upon and bring them to decay.

Wherever a true wife comes, home is always around her.

The stars may be overhead, the glow-worm in the night's cool grass may be the fire at her feet; but home is where she is, and for a noble woman it stretches far around her, better than houses ceiled with cedar or painted with vermillion—shedding its quiet for those who else are homeless.

This, I believe, is the woman's true place and power.

Catching a Cormorant.

Ned Monaghan, a Newark Bay fisherman, says he had a remarkable experience on the water on Sunday afternoon.

"I was having no sort of sport at all," he said, "and at about 5 o'clock in the evening I was lying half asleep in the stern of the boat, watching a lot of big black divers that were going under the water, catching lots of good fish and flyin' away with them. I had a long stretch of line out, but I was not thinking about it, when I got a bite that nearly pulled my wrist out of joint. I began to haul in the line, but it was no easy job, for the thing at the end of it was struggling like a shark. However, I had nearly got it all in, and I was watching for the head of a big fish to appear, when suddenly my line shot up out of the water and soared towards the clouds, carried by a diver that I had caught. It did not take him long to stretch it all out, now that he was on the wing. It broke off close to the reel, and the bird sailed away with the line streaming behind him. Cormorants, they are called, and a catch of one makes all the fishing you want for a day.—New York Sun.

of cinnamon, two pieces of mace, six cloves, two teaspoonsful of allspice, one of whole black pepper, one long pod of red pepper and a tablespoonful of mustard seed; let the vinegar boil for five minutes; pour the vinegar boiling hot over the cucumbers, and when perfectly cold tie up, and they will be fit to eat in a week.

A Sacred Tree.

In the East, the greatest veneration is paid to the Indian Ficus religiosa, the sacred and consecrated fig-tree or peepul-tree, of knowledge and wisdom, the holy Bo-tree of the lamas of Thibet. It is met with in most countries of South-eastern Asia; but the descriptions of it in botanical hand-books are confused and misleading. It is a handsome tree, growing frequently to a great height, an evergreen, which puts forth its flowers in April, and the bark yields freely upon incision an acrid milk containing a considerable proportion of india-rubber. According to Balfour, "the leaves are heart-shaped, long, pointed, and not unlike those of some poplars; and as the footstalks are long and slender, the leaves vibrate in the air like those of an aspen. It was under this tree that Gautama slept, and dreamed that his bed was the vast earth, and the Himalaya Mountains his pillow, while his left arm reached to the Eastern Ocean, his right to the Western Ocean, and his feet to the great South Seas." (Balfour's Cyclopædia of India.) This dream warned him that he was about to become a Buddha; and when its prophecy was fulfilled, he was again seated beneath the same tree.

In the year 250 B.C. a branch of this sacred tree was sent to the ancient city of Amuradhapoora, in the interior of Ceylon, together with the collar-bone of Gautama, and his begging-dish with other relics. Here it was planted, and was known by the name of the Bo-tree. The highest reverence was paid to it for two thousand years, and it is to this day the chief object of worship to the pilgrims who every year flock to the ruins of this city. These ruins are of vast extent, and abound in intricate and magnificent carvings. "An inclosure of three hundred and forty-five feet in length, and two hundred and sixteen in breadth, surrounds the court of the Bo-tree, designated by Buddhists the great, famous, and triumphant fig-tree." It is declared to be the same tree sprung from the branch sent by Asoka from Buddh-gya, and the amazing vigour and longevity of these trees make the assertion within the limits of the possible. "The city is in ruins," says Ferguson; "its great dagobas (sanctuaries containing relics) have fallen into decay; its monasteries have disappeared; but the great Bo-tree still flourishes, according to the legend: 'Ever green, never growing, or decreasing, but living on for ever for the delight and worship of mankind.' There is probably no older idol in the world, certainly none more venerated."

"Molly, I wish you would be a better little girl," said an Austin father to his little daughter. "You have no idea how sorry I am, that mama has to scold you all the time." "Don't worry about it, pa," was the reply of the little angel; "I am not one of those sensitive children. Half the time I don't hear what she says."—Texas Siftings.

Sunken Treasures

The list of treasure lost in the sea would indeed be a long and melancholy one; instancing for example, the Madagascar, from Australia, which, in the days of the gold fever there, having on board the precious yellow dust in enormous quantity, was never heard of and left not even the faintest clue to speculation as to her fate. And in later years the Thunder steamer, from Calcutta to China, with some £300,000 worth of silver, destined never to reach the expectant consignees, was supposed to be lying abandoned among the awful sandbanks at the mouth of the Hooghly, but, in spite of many rumors, never to be seen there. These are instances, out of many, of treasures never heard of. The wreck of the Royal Charter steamer from Australia, lost in a frightful gale on the Anglesea coast in October, 1859, with some £800,000 of gold on board, will doubtless occur to the readers mind, coupled as it was with such a lamentable loss of life. In this case, happily, a great part of the treasure was recovered subsequently, but there is still a fortune left at Moelfra for the fortunate being who can find it. In old days Vigo

A CITY OF PRETTY GIRLS.

The Way Steep Streets and Pure Air Contribute to the Beauty of Quebec Women.

"There are no homely girls in Quebec," a native-born Canadian said to a visitor to the ancient citidel city of Canada. "I have often stood at a window and watched for one in the throng passing on the sidewalks, but I have never yet seen a Quebec girl who could be described as ugly. I don't claim that they are all absolutely beautiful; but there is something in the clear, invigorating air, and perhaps in the soil and surroundings of this lofty and rocky city, that gives them sparkling eyes, brilliant complexions and elasticity of step. Montreal is full of pretty women, but Quebec can beat her in this respect. Have you noticed how easily our Quebec girls climb the steep city streets? When they are ascending a sidewalk that slopes upward at an apparant angle of 30°, they don't get out of breath, they don't stagger from one side of the walk to the other. They just go up as lightly and gracefully as any lady can walk across a parlor floor. You can't do it and keep pace with them unless you've been brought up here. They'd tire you out before you got half way from Breakneck steps to Dufferin Terrace. The exercise they get is partly the secret of their good looks.

"Then there's another thing that helps. They're out of doors half the time. On a pleasant evening the terrace, that broad plank promenade which stretches for a quarter of a mile along the the top of the precipice under the brow of Cape Diamond, is crowded with them, strolling in pairs and groups, chatting, laughing, and perhaps flirting a little. You don't mind that, do you? No. Well, look what a pleasure ground it is. Two hundred feet above the waters of the St. Lawrence, and facing one of the very finest views in the world, as everybody admits, which extends from Point Levi down the river to Cape Tourment, and from the gorge of Montmorenci far back among the Laurentian Mountains. You can't blame us Quebeckers for being proud of it. And there's where the Quebec girls breath the pure air that puts roses in their cheeks and the snap into their eyes. Yes, sir; steep streets and plenty of fresh air, and, perhaps, the subtle influences of a world-famous landscape, form the chief secret of the beauty of our girls."

Superstitions of Gamblers.

A friend of mine, who years ago used to travel up and down the Mississippi river, said to me: "I have watched gambling on the Mississippi steamboats night after night, and I have had a pretty fair chance of observing some of the superstitions of the old-time gamblers. For instance, they do not believe that there is any great luck in any of the precious stones except diamonds. If you have noticed the professional gamblers, even of these days, you will see that he usually wears no other ornament except diamonds. I don't believe that you could hire a gambler to wear a sun opal. Opals of all kinds are supposed to bring bad luck, but a sun opal, in a gambler's estimation, brings the worst luck of all. I have yet to see a gambler with nerve enough to sit down to a game wearing a sun opal. Another thing,

A New Application of Electricity.

The applications of electricity are continually being added to, but we doubt if one more curious or characteristic of the age in which we live has been adopted than the lighting up of a battlefield after nightfall to clear it of the wounded, in order that they may be more readily and speedily succored than can be the case with the ordinary methods of search. Last year experiments were made with success at Vienna by Dr. Beron Mundy, and this year following the example at Vienna, experiments have been made at Aldershot. The National Society for aid to the Sick and Wounded in War provided the funds, and on the 24th July Dr. Baron Mundy himself with Surgeon H. R. O. Cross, A. M. D., and a large party of army medical experts made the experiments at Aldershot. A movable steam engine was drawn by a pair of horses to a position on the brow of Cambridge Hill, about a hundred yards in front of it was placed a stand on which were the dynamo, the lamp, and the apparatus for burning the light, connected by a cable with the engine in the rear. A battle had been supposed to have taken place whilst daylight lasted, and the wounded were scattered on the slopes and in the valley. These men the bearer column with the aid of the electric light were to find, dress their wounds and take them into the collecting station in the valley. The electric apparatus did not work so smoothly as was desirable, the light being very intermittent (this defect can no doubt be remedied by other lamps or carbons). When the light was on, the searchers could not possibly have missed a wounded man lying in the white light; there was abundance of light for dressing wounds. The whole of the imaginary battlefield was searched in sections, the light being turned on to the next station as soon as the one immediately preceeding it was cleared of the wounded. The experiments proved the success of the principle, but many details will require to be perfected before it can be considered absolutely successful. The next step that we may expect to hear of is the continuance of a battle after nightfall by the illumination from the electric light. These experiments show that there is still further scope for the electrical engineer.—Journal of Commerce.

How to Buy a Horse.

An old horseman says; "If you want to buy a horse, don't believe your own brother. Take no man's word for it. Your eye is your market. Don't buy a horse in harness. Unhitch him and take everything off but his halter, and lead him around. If he has a corn, or is stiff, or has any other failing you can see it. Let him go by himself a way, and if he staves right into anything you know he is blind. No matter how clear and bright his eyes are, he can'a see any more than a bat. Back him, too. Some horses show their tricks in that way when they don't in any other. But, be as smart as you can, you'll get caught sometimes. Even an expert gets stuck. A horse may look ever so nice and go a great pace, and yet have fits. There isn't a man could tell it till something happens. Or he may have a weak back. Give him the whip and off he goes for a mile or two, then all of a happily, a great part of the treasure was recovered subsequently, but there is still a fortune left at Moelfra for the fortunate being who can find it. In old days Vigo Bay had always an attractive sound to treasure seekers, from the reported wealth on board the Spanish fleet destroyed there by Sir G. Rooke 1702; but the infinite pains, money, and patience extended over its recovery have been thrown away, the silver (even if it is there, which is somewhat doubtful) obstinately refusing to make a reappearance in the world.

Escaping From Brigands.

The circumstances under which the son of Consul Dussi, recently captured by brigands near Rodosto, Roumelia, was liberated without paying a ransom, are related as follows: The brigands were surrounded by a detachment of troops under orders not to attack until the young man should be in safety. Meanwhile the brigands had run short of provisions, especially of wine M. Dussi, their captive, suggested that he should be allowed to write to his father to send a few bottles, which was readily assented to. M. Dussi accordingly wrote the letter, but, as none of the band could read, he proposed that a strong narcotic should be mixed with the wine, and that a sum of $500 and a free pardon should be promised to the messenger if he assisted him to escape. The plan was carried out. When the wine arrived the brigands eagerly partook of it, and were soon stupefied by the effects of the narcotic it contained. M. Dussi and his guide were thus enabled to get away and to reach the nearest village occupied by the gendarmes. The brigands were then easily taken prisoners by the troops under the command of General Mehemet Pacha. The member of the band who contributed to M. Dussi's escape has received the $500 promised to him, and will not be in any way molested by the authorities.—English Paper.

"Blind as a Bat."

"Blind as a bat" is an old saying so much the reverse of fact that it is not easy to explain how it ever obtained currency among people who had seen the animal. Nevertheless, bats are not dependant upon their eyesight for a means of getting about in the dark. They are able to fly with great speed and accuracy, to avoid obstacles, and to enter small holes without making the least mistake. Experiences have shown that this singular power of direction is due to a remarkable development of the sense of touch especially to be found in their great expanse of wing. Further, these animals possess large ears and curious nostrils, some of which are leaf-like formations of the most extraordinary description. The skin growths are all supposed to have reference to the skill with which the creatures wing their way in the darkest caves. Most bats feed on insects which they catch on the wing; some of them eat fruit, and a few enjoy a bad name because they suck the blood of other animals. Of the last are the so-called vampire bats, respecting which it used to be said that they fanned their victim with their wings while they sucked its lifeblood, but that part of the tale is altogether fabulous.

opal, in a gambler's estimation, brings the worst luck of all. I have yet to see a gambler with nerve enough to sit down to a game wearing a sun opal. Another thing, your professional gambler will never allow you to touch his chair when he is playing. In old times, when the stakes were high on the river boats, many a bloody quarrel has grown out of an infraction of this unwritten law. Usually a gambler will at once leave the game, and if he returns he will not play for large stakes. Now I will give you one more, which, perhaps, is the most universal rule among gamblers, even to this day. At midnight, the "old timer" will arise from the board and partake of a light lunch, and, perhaps, a little wine. When he resumes his seat you will observe that he has changed his hat. This is an unvarying rule. To sit through a game with the same hat on in the gambler's maxims considered little less foolish than giving his money away. Do all of the gamblers of to-day keep up the same superstitions? Some of them do, but they have no need to. There are very few games nowadays where a man is not certain to lose all he has if the gambler only wishes to take it. Within the past fifteen years I have not seen a game where cheating, more or less adroit, was not indulged in to trip the unwary."—Cor. Boston Traveller.

A Matter of Interest.

Peter Cooper was always a careful and prudent business man. He was strongly opposed to the methods of many merchants who launched out into many extravagant enterprises on borrowed money, for which they paid exorbitant rates of interest.

Once, while talking about a project with an acquaintance, the latter said he would have to borrow the money for six months, paying interest at the rate of three per centum per month.

"Why do you borrow for so short a time?" Mr. Cooper asked.

"Because the broker will not negotiate bills for longer."

"Well, if you wish," said Mr. Cooper, "I will discount your note at that rate for three years."

"Are you in earnest?" asked the would-be borrower.

"Certainly I am. I will discount your note for ten thousand dollars for three years at that rate. Will you do it?"

"Of course I will," said the merchant.

"Very well," said Mr. Cooper, "just sign this note for ten thousand dollars, payable in three years, and give me your check for eight hundred dollars, and the transaction is complete."

"But where is the money for me?" asked the astonished merchant.

"You don't get any money," was the reply. "Your interest for thirty-six months, at three per centum per month, amounts to one hundred and eight per centum or ten thousand eight hundred dollars; therefore your check for eight hundred dollars just makes us even."

The force of this practical illustration of the folly of paying such an exorbitant price for the use of money was such that the merchant determined never to borrow at such ruinous rates, and he frequently used to say that nothing could have so fully convinced him as this rather humorous proposal by Mr. Cooper.

The weak points of a horse can be better discovered while standing than while moving.

If he is sound, he will stand firmly and squarely on his limbs without moving any of them, the feet flatly upon the ground, with legs plump and naturally poised: or if the foot is lifted from the ground and the weight taken from it, disease may be suspected, or at least tenderness, which is a precursor of disease. If the horse stands with his feet spread apart, or straddles with his hind legs, there is a weakness in the loins, and the kidneys are disordered. Heavy pulling bends the knees. Bluish, milky cast eyes in horses indicate moon blindness or something else. A bad tempered horse keeps his ears thrown back. A kicking horse is apt to have scarred knees. A stumbling horse has blemished knees. When the skin is rough and harsh, and does not move easily to the touch, the horse is a heavy eater, and digestion is bad. Never buy a horse whose breathing organs are at all impaired. Place your ear at the side of the heart, and if a wheezing sound is heard it is an indication of trouble.—Rural Record.

The Architecture of South American Indians.

There is considerable variety in the shape and appearance of the houses made by South American Indians, even of the same tribe. In this village there were three different designs. First there was the open-sided shed which appeared to be used in common by the whole village for cooking purposes; then there were three rectangular building with roofs sloping nearly to the ground and sides made of split palm-leaves woven in and out between small poles, which were occupied by the larger portion of the villagers; and last of all was a large, round affair with a comical roof of palm thatch, and with plaited sides, which was occupied for sleeping purposes, but, singularly enough solely by the men. These last four houses were provided with narrow entrances, but were unlighted in any other way. Their floors were of Mother earth, trampled smooth and hard by many naked feet, and their roofs inside were shiny black from the soot and smoke wich had accumulated there. Strung wherever space could be found were the small cotton hammocks of the Indians, and beneath each during the night burned a little fire to warm the naked body of the sleeper. In the rafters overhead, stretched from pole to pole, were the long straight bows and shiny yellow arrows of the warriors, and may be among the lot the deadly blow-pipe, or hanging from a peg, the paddle-shaped war club used by these people. Various earthernware utensils lay around, and the ingenious basket-work matapie, or cassava strainer, was never absent.

To show that it has no claim to fairness in discussion it cuts out sentences of THE EXPRESS at random and then makes some silly remarks thereon which are supposed to be very smart. The Standard, as Dundreary would say, has a capacity for "making an ath of ithelf" unequalled by any modern journal that we know of.

—The local Tory organ denies the charge of THE EXPRESS that it defended corruption in Sir John Macdonald's election in 1882. We have not files of the Standard at hand to quote the exact language from, but everybody knows who reads that paper that it did defend the corruption then practiced by its friends. It is all very well for the organ now to challenge us to proof when it knows its issue is so small that one would require a search warrant to find a copy just after the edition is mailed, not to speak of one a year old.

—The Presidential fight is waxing warm across the lines. Cleveland's chances are in an equally lofty tone, and the people will be more than edified. Talk about mud-slinging! If this does not capture the bakery, what will?

ERNESTTOWN FALL SHOW.

The Ernesttown Agricultural Society held their annual exhibition in the drill shed, Odessa, on Saturday, 27th ult. Although the weather was a little leaky that did not deter an unusual number of exhibitors from getting their exhibits on the ground. LETTERS FROM KHARTOUM.

The Times' Correspondent Sends Extracts from his Diary.

LONDON, Sept. 29.—The Times' Khartoum correspondent, April 28, reports that Gordon was laying mines in all directions. Food was dear. Gordon had issued paper money, the treasury being at Berber, and was paying the soldiers with it. The town was quiet. Half of the population joined the rebels previous to the beginning of the siege. No news had been received from the British government. Under date of July 30 the correspondent says the town was closely besieged for five months, and would be able to hold out only two months longer. Rations were being issued to the poor. The correspondent sends extracts from his diary in the course of which he says:—One Arab horseman suffices to frighten 200 of our men. On the day Saati Bey was killed, eight rebels charged 200 of our men, armed with Remington rifles, and dispersed them. The only men we are able to depend on are degroes. He states that Gordon is well.

across the lines. Cleveland's chances are beginning to look brighter. The scandal of his youthful days unearthed against him has been almost counterbalanced by one in which Blaine figures, and as Cleveland's public record is pure and his opponents badly smeared by the notorious Mulligan and Fisher letters, there is a prospect of the former being chosen. If it should result that Butler and St. John poll a sufficiently large vote so that neither Cleveland nor Blaine gets a majority of the whole electoral vote then Congress will elect the President, and as Congress has lately been Democratic, Cleveland's election would be almost certain. However, the 4th of November will decide the issue.

—It seems that the "minions of the law" are experiencing some difficulty in serving Mr. Hawley with the writ protesting his election, that gentleman being away from home. The Mail of Wednesday had the following in connection therewith.—

"Mr. Hawley's organ in Napanee recently proclaimed that that gentleman was ready—aye, ready—to face the protest against his election. He was said to be confident of success. He is displaying his anxiety in a somewhat remarkable manner. For three days a shoriff's bailiff has been after him for the purpose of serving him with a writ, but the nimble member has managed so far to elude him. He is a very active young man."

Mr. Hawley should feel flattered. For a Liberal M.P.P. to be called an "active young man" by the Mail is great praise. That journal usually speaks of Liberals as "bull pups," etc. We have no doubt Mr. Hawley will return home when it suits his convenience, and that the writ will be duly served. There is no law to compel him to remain home all year or put himself to any inconvenience to meet the behests of a sheriff's bailiff. Our Conservative friends should therefore keep cool. If they wish the trial to proceed they will have a full opportunity. Mr. Hawley, we know, has no fear of the result; if anything annoys him at all it is the knowledge of the expense and inconvenience he will be put to, no matter how the trial ends—and he is not a man who has either time or money to spare in litigation. He knows, as does everybody else, that the protest is merely a petty piece of persecution instigated for the purpose of driving him out of public life. But it will be unsuccessful. The trap set for him will yet catch the man who set it.

—The Beaver and Kingston News are just now exchanging courtesies. The Beaver calls the Kingston contemporary an "old dame," and the News retorts by dubbing the Beaver "a miserable straddle-the-fence and gossips' manual." It further says:—

"It [the Beaver] has mistaken its vocation. The braying of a jackass may appear supremely awe-inspiring to the inhabitants of Dundas-st., but we are afraid that they only afford a little harmless amusement to any one who has crossed the Napanee River. Length of ears is certainly a consideration in gossip-mongering, but the enunciation of the principles of statecraft require increase in another direction. * * Ignorance is not, so far as we are aware, a crime; it may not even be considered a fault in a-gatherer-up-of-unconsidered trifles, but it has no place in journalism. This need not, however, cause the editor of the alleged paper in question any concern, as the imbecility of the few remarks which it does occasionally grind off, has not the remotest connection with the profession mentioned. * * We can only smile at his ludicrous attempts to slay not one thousand, but one, with the jaw-bone of an ass. * * What is bred in the bone will come out in the flesh, and the silly old Beaver will be the same silly old woman to the end of the chapter."

This is rather rough on our local contemporary, and we extend our sympathy. But the Beaver will, no doubt retort this week

A BURGLARIOUS ASSASSIN.

He Pulls out a Revolver and Shoots a Would-Be Capturer.

Considerable excitement was caused at Brockville on Sunday last by the report that a man had been shot at Bellamy's Station, nine miles from Brockville on the Canada Pacific Railway. The following are the facts of the case:—During Friday and Saturday burglaries have been perpetrated in the village of Irish Creek, on the C. P. R. Early on Sunday morning the burglars, three in number, entered the general store of Mr. C. Richards, of Irish Creek, but when they were alarmed by a boy sleeping in the store they took a hasty departure without securing any booty for their trouble. Mr. Richards, surmising that the burglars had gone towards Brockville, started in pursuit, taking eight men with him on a hand-car. When they arrived at Bellamy's Station at three o'clock Sunday afternoon they discovered three men sitting on the fence beside the railway. The hand-car was stopped and Richards asked where they were going, whereupon one of the men pulled a revolver and shot him through the face, the ball entering the cheek on the left side and after passing through his mouth and dislodging a number of teeth, passed through his right cheek. He was at once placed on the hand-car and brought to Brockville, and the alarm was given in the neighborhood where the affair occurred. The Chief of Police, accompanied by two officers and a number of men armed with revolvers and rifles, immediately started for the scene of the shooting, and hopes are entertained that the guilty parties will be captured. The wounded man is now lying at the St. Lawrence Hotel, Brockville, and it is expected that he may recover.

THE MILLINERY OPENINGS.

Elaborate Display of Ladies' Head Wear.

The weather on Saturday was not favorable to a large attendance at the millinery openings, but notwithstanding large numbers of ladies visited the leading establishments and inspected the elaborate conceptions of modestes for their adornment. A drizzling rain continued all day and walking was anything but pleasant. Those who were in town, therefore, were driven to the refuge of the stores and the bright and beautiful displays therein furnished a striking contrast with the dreary state of things outside. Below we give brief descriptions of the displays of leading establishments :—

P. Slaven & Co.

Though this popular house did not announce a formal opening it was well known that a fine display of millinery would be made and hence there were many visitors. There was no attempt at decorations but the newest and most fashionable goods were shown in great profusion in every department. Interest however largely centred in the millinery department, over which Miss Shannon so efficiently presides. We give below the result of our representative's visit :—

In conversation with Miss Shannon as to the new styles and shapes we learned that this season the hats will have a tendency to roll, which makes them much more becoming. The much worn but still popular poke is still in vogue. The names of some of the other favorites are Argyle, Antique, Rubina, Primrose, Amaranth, Minnock and Maisie. The trimmings this season are unusually rich and beautiful, the knotted chenille velvets, Terras and Tinseled Ganaze being among the novelties. Fancy feathers, tips and plumes of every description are used in great profusion and ornaments of every shape and design are still in great demand.

Among the hats on exhibition was a very handsome pattern made of golden brown velvet. It was covered perfectly plain. The edge is formed of a net work of beads of the same shade about two inches in width. The trimming is rendered very effective by having the plume drooping over the left side and falling low on the hair. The front finished with an an Aigrette of golden tips to match the plume and large bow of very rich ribbon caught with jewelled spears.

Another very beautiful hat was of Mousse velvet with very large square crown, brim slightly rolling in front, the edge formed of a handsome trimming of misel and bronze chenille, two very large Mousse plumes twisted so as to form an elegant trimming in front, the tips of one falling off at left side, the right side of the hat being entirely plain. The plumes are fastened with a very pretty silver buckle and knot of velvet of same shade.

One bonnet in copper-colored velvet, especially caught the eye. It was in the Marie Stuart shape, the brim being made almost entirely of small gold bead, the inside of the brim having a full puffing of copper-colored satin and the trimming composed simply of beautiful large Argrette held in place by a large golden claw. The crown of the bonnet was dotted with small gold beads, ties to match bonnet in copper color and gold and caught with small bronze bugs.

We noticed an exceedingly pretty bonnet for a child in Coquelicot velvet, that bright shade being unusually becoming. The shape was called the Frow Frow and was trimmed very prettily with a twist of velvet and cluster of tips of same shade and shining through the tips was a beautiful gold butterfly.

There is in connection a well maintained dress-making department conducted by Miss Allison, who has a thorough knowledge of the business and leaves nothing undone to and gentlemen. The entire display was most creditable to the firm. It should be seen to be appreciated. It will be seen by advertisement elsewhere that the decorations will be kept up till to-morrow (Saturday) in order to give people from the country who were prevented by the rain of last Saturday from seeing the display, to witness it.

In the fur department this firm may be said to excell all others both in point of larger variety, rich goods and superior make and finish. They are just now in receipt of all their new stock for this season and their display is well worth going to see. We noticed some very rich Persian lamb coats for men as well as the fine prime North-Western coon coat which they have sold so largely other seasons. They also show for ladies fine seal, Persian lamb, Bokaren lamb and Astracan dog mantles. A large lot of fur lined circulars as well as muff bows and caps of seal, Persian lamb, Astracan, Bokaren, Mink, &c. Men's seal and Persian lamb caps and large lots of robes, in fact everything that is new, tasty, rich, warm and good and at prices in unison with the low figure of barley. They also show the packages of skins of same quality as that from which their furs are made and whenever desired are prepared to make up men's coats and ladies' mantles in first-class style and fit. The number of these garments which they have made up in the past three seasons is a sufficient guarantee of their ability in this line. We should say from the large stock they are now showing they intend to do the fur trade for these counties.

Downey & Co.

Up to a few years ago this firm marked their openings by gorgeous decorations throughout the whole establishment and the occasion was a fete day with the ladies, but for the past three or four years they have dispensed with all paraphernalia and left the goods to speak for themselves in the natural way. The result has been most satisfactory. The goods look in the store the same as when taken to the homes of the purchasers, and there are no complaints. Our representative took a walk through the various departments on Saturday, and the result of his observations is given below :—

In the Dress Goods Department the newest goods shown are, all wool Tricots, Bayadere Frise effects, with plain to match, for combination suits; Guillemmas, French Tuilles, Astrakhan checks, Repps, Bison Cloth. They have also a special importation of English mourning goods. The new colors for dress goods are Punch and Neapolitan Blues, Tobacco and Golden Browns, Russet and Huntsman's Greens, Pompeiian Red, Powder, Wood, Ash Greys, etc. Special value in Silk Plushes, Plush Trimmings, and Plush Velveteens, which will be largely worn for suits and trimmings. Plain and Brocaded Frise in Silk and Satins, in Rhadzimir, Sicilienne, Marveilleux. Duchess and Venetians will also be fashionable.

The Dress Making Department is under the efficient management of Miss Green, and is increasing in popularity, notwithstanding that this department has always occupied a leading position in the firm's business. All the latest fashion plates are shown.

In the Fancy Goods and Notions Department there are full lines in kid gloves, Jersey gloves, ladies' braided and plain Jerseys, ladies' and children's wool hoods and fascinators, tobogganing tuques, corsets, hosiery, rubber circulars, ladies' and children's lace collars, shawls, linen and silk handkerchiefs, mantle clasps, ornaments, etc.

In Mantle Cloths, they have Chevoit Checks, Sealettes, Persian Lamb, Jersey Webbing, Ottomans, Mattalaisse, and Polarian, a new woolen stuff for jackets, ulsters, Hooper & Barber.

The millinery rooms of this new and enterprising firm were open on Saturday. In the main store a very choice display of all kinds of dry goods was made, while in the millinery department, which is under the management of Miss Wilson, a modiste of much taste and skill, an elegant show of hats and bonnets was made. The dress-making department, which is superintended by Miss Henderhan, was also a centre of interest and excellent work was shown. We append descriptions of a few of the many elegant hats and bonnets shown in the millinery room :—

Among the hats are the following :—A covered hat of moss green silk velvet, high tapering crown, straight rim, sloping at at back, an ostrich feather headed with bunch of tips, on side of crown a large shaded bird peeping from under tip, a large round double fan of velvet on left front extending a couple of inches above crown with a battle axe pin on each pleat. Another pretty conception was a high crown olive green felt hat, rolling rim, a deep band of cut silk velvet, band of silk velvet drawn loosely around the crown caught in antique loops with cone shaped gilt pins, a large ostrich aigrette on left front with short green plume falling gracefully over rim to back. A third was a cadet grey felt, medium crown, rolling rim, large in front, close at back, trimmed with three reversed pleatings of London smoke silk velvet, tips of the same color with a large aigrette of terracotta.

Among the bonnets was one in two shades of golden brown, a close V shaped crown, slightly flaring front of reversed pleats three in cluster with space between crown a darker shade three-quarters of a yard with crown to front, three groups af pleak with a space between, slanting down at back of crown—the fullness is divided and comes in pleats at each tie—made ties of velvet in large bow—a large shaded gold and brown plume twisted on top front.

New York Bonnets—Small square crowns of straw and made velvets—fancy gilt velvets in different designs—Chenille, Aigrettes, Antique, feather bonnets in amber brown Champignion and the different shades of Coquelicot; handsome flowers in all the new shades and designs. French bonnets trimmed very high in front; New York bonnets very flat. A very nice variety of crape bonnets in all the new shapes is also shown.

HINCH, PERRY & CO.

This firm, as usual, at considerable expense and labor, made a most magnificent display throughout their entire establishment. The windows were elegantly dressed ; the inside of the main store was carpeted and the long stretch of room was canopied by lace curtains. The right counter contained an elaborate display of silks and satins most tastefully arranged ; the left counter was weighed down with tweeds, coatings, gents' furnishings, etc., while the rear counters contained ladies' haberdashery, fancy goods and a variety of articles which space will not permit of mentioning. The exquisite blending of rich draperies, beautiful flowers and bright colored ribbons rendered the millinery show room, which is located in the rear of the main store, the centre of attraction. The display in this department was unique in design, variety and richness of material and reflected the highest credit on the lady in charge, Mrs. Doxsee. In conversation with her we learned that among the leading shapes in bonnets for this season are the Marie Stuart, Leona, Ruby, Pearl, Langtry, and the Horse-Shoe is still worn. Our attention was drawn to one bonnet in particular, a French pattern called Marie Stuart. The brim comes to a point in front and is covered with chenille cord in two shades of green and the crown is covered plain with velvet of the same shade and is trimmed on the right side with folds of velvet caught down with two steel birds, and the left side is finished with a bunch of flowers in chenille of the same shade and ties to match.

Another bonnet, very much the same shape made in golden brown plush. The brim is made all in cords of plush, and is folded loosely from the point in the front over the crown, which forms the trimming and all, and a bunch of aigretts and wings of the same shade near the front, ties of satin ribbon with raised velvet flowers caught at each side with gilt and steel pins in the shape of a claw.

A French pattern hat in bronze green felt called the Duchess has a high pointed crown and a narrow rolling brim turned up to a point in the front, trimmed with velvet and pins of the same shade and a cluster of tips and wings near the front, shaded from a bronze down to gold.

Another hat, high square crown. The brim turns up high on the left and slopes off to the crown on the right and covered plain in golden brown plush and trimmed with feathers and pon pons.

Among the leading shapes for hats are Primrose, Roslyn, Natalie, Warwick, Mascotte, Mother Hubbard, Abbie Anderson. Few flowers and those chiefly of Chenille will be used while large quantities of tips, aignettes plumes, birds, wings, large pon pons, ornaments, pins, etc., are displayed, which, with plushes, Terry velvets and ribbons form the chief decorations and adornments. The new colors are Coquelicot, Mousse, Moidre, Ardoise, Coleus Fentre, Poudre and Tabac. In ribbons very rich effects are obtained by the new double face designs, the chief being combinations of plain velvet and satin, Terry velvet and Ottoman silk, Ottoman velvet and plain satin, Ottoman satin and Ottoman velvet, gold Ottoman cord satin and plain black satin.

The second flat was occupied entirely by a display of carpets and raw silk curtains. The carpets were suspended along the walls and covered the floor. They composed about seventy-five pieces in Velvet, Brussels and Tapestry, and for richness of design and quality were the finest ever displayed in town. A number of gentleman's hats and caps were also shown here, besides an elaborate display of furs for both ladies and gents. In the ladies' department we noticed a new woolen stuff for jackets, ulsters, trimmings; it comes in smooth, curled, fleecy, piled surface, imitating the skins of the Persian Lamb in Iron Rust Browns, Dark Greens, Bronze and Black. The new Marabout trimming will largely take the place of fur, as it comes in all the new shades to match the goods.

In the Fur Department is shown a magnificent range of South Sea Seal, Persian Lamb, Otter, Coney-Alaska Mink, French and Persian Seal, Arctic Seal, in caps, capes, muffs, boas, etc., Astrachan, Bokharen, Persian Lamb and South Sea Seal mantles. Japanese goat robes in black, white and grey. An immense stock of staples is displayed.

The Millinery Department, presided over by Miss Phalen, contained an immense variety of hats and bonnets. A few are described herewith, together with some notes as to the new shapes and trimmings:—

"The Felicia," a golden brown French felt hat, high crown, broad rolling brim, slightly flaring towards the front, trimmed high to the left with alternate loops of golden brown Ottoman plush ribbon and pompoms of the same shade, from which falls to the right an elegant golden brown ostrich plume.

"The Sombrero"—An extremely stylish shape, becoming to almost any style of beauty—done in Powder Grey Plush, the crevassing of the brim alone showing artistic taste. Three Ash Grey plumes, held in position by a handsome cat's paw of same shade, constituted the trimming of one of the most elegant hats of the season.

"The Papellotte"—A Bronze soft French felt, a hat made expressly to be worn with the tailor made suit. The rim is plainly bound, and the crown, which is extremely high, is piquiantly adorned by a fancy plume and bird, shading from a bronze to a Cresson Green.

Quite a variety of extremely stylish bonnets are shown, in all the new shades. One in particular attracted our attention, "The Onita," having a ground work of Pompeiian red Silure, over which was drawn a network of red gold tinselette. The narrow brim was done in crevassed Pompeiian plush; to the left were foullettes of embossed plush ribbon, finished with fancy Aigrette ties of the same material, held in position by miniature tiger's claws.

Children's capotes are shown in a variety of styles from the snug fitting Normandy cap to the becoming and comfortable Mother Hubbard and Fish-Wife.

Plumes and feathers, both plain and ornamental, will be worn in profusion. Bird's wings, aigrettes and fancy claws still hold precedence; any flowers worn will be of the most expensive French manufacture. Fancy ribbons will play a very prominent part in millinery this season. They come in all the new shades and the designs are really elegant.

French felts and the English fur felt, will find an opponent in the stylishly made, plush hat and bonnet.

The new shades which come to us this season are the Powder and Wood Ash Grey, Pompeiian Reds, Cresson Green, and no longer are we sure of the exact shade of our fashionable and sedate brown. We have the color in endless deviations, tones and semi-tones, with a gradual blending from the old original brown, golden, sombre reddish, iron rust, to the coffee brown, with plenty of cream in it. Neapolitan blues and olive shades will also be very fashionable.

The tailoring department, under the efficient management of Mr. J. Walters, is as usual, at this season, crowded with orders. The stock this year is large and more varied than ever before. Among the new goods are Elysian naps for overcoatings, which be very fashionable this season.

SIDNEY'S FOLLY

"Good-morning," said Sidney, giving him her hand with a little smile. "I forgot that you were going to hunt to-day Where is the meet?"

"At Cotley Hall. I thought you would go with us."

"No," she answered, with a little shake of her pretty head, "I shall not hunt this winter. Are we late, I wonder? Stephen does not like to be kept waiting on these occasions, or indeed on any other," she added, with a laugh. "I do not know any one who does."

Stephen Daunt, also attired in hunting "pink" and faultless "tops," was in the dining-room, glancing over the morning papers, and Dolly, in a bewitching costume of seal-brown velvet, was hovering between the window and the table, and glancing impatiently at the clock now and again. At sight of Sidney she uttered a little exclamation of disappointment.

"Oh, Sidney, have you forgotten? We promised Lady Cotley we would drive over for the meet," she said eagerly; and Sidney looked over at her blankly.

"I had quite forgotten, dear," she answered hurriedly—"I really had quite forgotten."

Lloyd Milner was not so completely entranced by the charming little vision in brown velvet, with the pouting expression of disappointment on its fair face, but that he saw the cold conventional greeting which passed between Sidney and her husband—a greeting perfectly courteous, and yet as perfectly indifferent as if they were visitors at the same country-house, but had only a very slight acquaintance.

"It is the perfection of a hunting morning," Stephen said heartily, as Sidney walked to the head of the table, and began to make the tea. "You are favored, Milner."

"Yes, I was just saying to Mrs. Daunt that we had the proverbial southerly wind and cloudy sky," Milner returned, smiling. "You don't hunt, Miss Daunt?"

"No, I ride to the meet sometimes," Dolly answered; "but I hoped Sidney would drive me there to-day."

Sidney said nothing; her slim white fingers were moving deftly among the delicate old china and silver, and she seemed not to have heard. In reality she was wondering how she could surmount the difficulty which had suddenly arisen to hinder her going to Lymouth. She had utterly forgotten her promise to drive to Cotley; but, if Dolly did not go, she—Sidney—would have no opportunity of going alone to meet Frank.

"How did you sleep, Milner?" Stephen asked, as he threw aside the newspapers and came over to take his place at the table. "Well, I hope?"

"Tolerably well," said his friend, with a laugh. "Easthorpe is too new a residence to possess the distinction of a ghost, I presume?"

"I suppose so," Stephen answered carelessly. "Why do you ask?"

"Because, if it were not, I should say I heard one last night," was the reply. "Mrs. Daunt, may I send you some of this omelet?"

"What do you mean, Mr. Milner?" said Dolly eagerly. "Did you hear any with a little unsteadiness in her low tones and with her eyes downcast. "But," she added in a moment, raising them suddenly and looking over at her guest with a glance of mingled entreaty and defiance, "I think Mr. Milner has drawn as largely upon his imagination as he is capable of going at one sitting."

"No, on my honor," the young man declared laughingly, "I am dealing solely with facts this morning, Mrs. Daunt."

"Are you?" she said coldly. "Then forgive me for being sceptical as to your supernatural visitors."

"You cannot be more sceptical than I am as to their connection with the spirit-world," he replied,

"Mr. Milner," put in Dolly impatiently, "pray be more explicit. I can keep my curiosity within bounds no longer."

There was a short silence. Stephen was glancing over his letters, and not paying much attention to the conversation between his sister and his friend. Sidney, her heart beating to suffocation, was dreading with a terrible dread what Milner might say next.

"It was a beautiful moonlit night," began Mr. Milner gravely, breaking the top off an egg, and speaking with great deliberation.

"Well?" Dolly said impatiently, as he paused. "You begin like the old song—

"'Twas a beautiful night,
And the stars shone bright,
And the moon o'er the waters played.'"

"And, if you like, I will continue in the same manner," he said—

"'When a cavalier
To a bower drew near
A lady to serenade.'"

Dolly laughed.

"La suite a demain," she said with a pout. "You are inventing as you go on."

"Not at all, I assure you. I am merely putting into poetical language what you are anxious to hear," he answered quietly.

"Do you mean that any cavalier was serenading a lady in this bower?"

"I mean just that," he said coolly, looking up suddenly and glancing from Dolly's eager, puzzled, smiling face to Sidney's, so pale and startled.

"What fun!" cried Dolly gaily. "How did he serenade? Had he a guitar? Whose window did he look at? I should think it was Lord de la Poer serenading you, Sidney!"

Sidney forced a smile to her pale lips; the suspense and uncertainty were almost more than she could bear. What had he seen? What had he heard? What was he going to say next? She felt ill and giddy in her terror, but struggled desperately against the feeling of faintness which increased every moment, and to which she dared not yield. If she were to swoon now, they would begin to suspect something, and this keen eyed barrister's suspicions—for he suspected her undoubtedly—would become certainties. Her long sleepless night had made this more of an effort than her strength was quite equal to; but she gathered up all her courage, and, when she spoke, her voice was languidly sweet as usual, but very low.

"Serenading me! Is that likely, Dolly, when you are here?" she said. "Besides, the Earl plays no instrument. I "Don't you think a drive would do you good, Sidney?" her husband said presently, throwing aside the newspaper that he had been reading. "You look very pale this morning."

"My head aches too much to go out," she answered petulantly. "But"—eagerly—"there is no need for Dolly to stay at home. I shall do very well alone."

Dolly made a feeble protest, her blue eyes denying her words.

"I shall be better alone," Sidney said eagerly, repenting of her eagerness the next moment when she discovered Lloyd Milner's eyes fixed upon her over his newspaper.

"But I am afraid Dolly is not to be trusted with your ponies, Sidney," said Stephen, glancing at his sister and smiling.

Sydney looked blank. She must have the ponies herself, to drive to Lymouth.

"No," she said dubiously; "but Lady Golightly will carry Dolly beautifully, and she would not be long changing her dress."

"Oh, that will be too delightful!" Dolly cried ecstatically. "Don't say 'No' Stephen. I promise I shall not want to follow. I will come home with the groom as soon as I have seen the meet."

"Of course, if Sidney likes to trust you with Lady Golightly, I am quite willing," the young man answered lightly. "Milner may take the responsibility of your care upon his shoulders, if he likes."

"Will you, Mr. Milner?" Dolly asked demurely. "I won't be a very great nuisance, I promise you."

"I think I can bear the infliction for once," was the grave answer, while the pleasant gray eyes frankly show ther delight at the proposal; and Dolly hastened away to put on her habit just as the horses were brought round.

Sidney breathed a sigh of relief; when once they were gone, she would be free for a few hours—and she had plenty of work before her. On looking into her purse that morning, she had found that her supply of money was very small, amounting to merely a few pounds, she must therefore go and cash a cheque before going to Lymouth. This would entail a drive into Ashford, which was the only difficulty—for Stephen's liberality had made his wife a rich woman, able to draw cheques without much fear of overdrawing her banking account. Of course it would require time, and she had not much between this and twelve o'clock. She glanced at the timepiece—it was nearly ten. The meet was at half-past ten; but Cotley was but three miles from Easthorpe.

"You are quite sure you will not be dull?" Dolly said, coming into the room, looking distractingly pretty in her dark blue habit and coquettish riding-hat. "It seems so selfish to leave you, Sidney."

"Not at all," Sidney answered, with almost feverish eagerness. "I shall enjoy being alone. And—and—Dolly, don't hurry back on my account. If—if you think you would like to go to Lambswold, pray do; I shall not be dull."

"You seem awfully anxious to get rid of me," pouted Dolly. "I believe you have some desperate design on hand, Madam Sidney."

Ah, how cruel the hot blood was that it rose so redly in her pale cheeks at Dolly's laughing heedless words! Sidney

Mrs. Daunt, may I send you some of this omelet?"

"What do you mean, Mr. Milner?" said Dolly eagerly. "Did you hear any sounds in the house last night?"

"Yes," he replied smilingly, glancing at the pretty eager face, "I heard soft swift footsteps and the rustling of a woman's gown along——"

A little clatter drowned the remainder of the words. Sidney had let the sugar-tongs fall from her unsteady fingers, and they had broken one of the fragile old china cups of the costly breakfast-service. Dolly, an ardent chinamaniac, looked dismayed.

"Oh, Sidney, what a pity! One of those lovely old cups!"

"It was very awkward," Sidney murmured with pale lips, looking far more startled than such a small catastrophe warranted, and uneasily conscious that Lloyd Milner's keen eyes were watching her with a keen scrutiny.

"It is not worth while getting so pale over it," Stephen said kindly, glancing at the little pale face. "It is a very small misfortune and easily repaired. Why, Sidney," he added, with a smile, "you look as frightened as if you had seen Milner's ghost!"

If Lloyd Milner had thought his young hostess pale before, he was startled now by the strange, almost ghastly pallor which spread over her face. What was its cause? he wondered. Had she an absurd dread of the supernatural, or——

"Tell us something more about your ghost, Mr. Milner," Dolly broke in gaily. "I shall be frightfully jealous if Stephen and Sidney set up a ghost here when we do not possess one at Lambswold. I have always been so sorry not to have a legend or something equally delicious associated with it."

"I am afraid the Easthorpe ghost will turn out something so very prosaic that you will not envy its possessors," said the barrister calmly, eating his breakfast, yet keenly observant of Sidney under his air of indifference.

"Prosaic? How can a ghost be prosaic?" asked Dolly, laughing. "How can soft swift footsteps and mysterious rustlings be prosaic?"

"Perhaps the term is misapplied," the young man answered, with a smile; "for surely there is nothing prosaic in midnight rendezvous given 'au clair de la lune.'"

He was looking at Dolly as he spoke, but his keen vision took in also Sidney's pale face and drooping figure.

"The plot thickens," Dolly said, laughing, and affecting to shudder. "To soft swift footsteps and mysterious rustling robes we have to add midnight and moonlight. Pray go on Mr. Milner; I am on thorns with curiosity."

"Do you find the position a pleasant one?" he asked, looking over at her with a smile.

"By no means. Release me from it," she pleaded, with a delicious little moue.

"Dolly, what a chatterbox you are!" said Stephen, laughing. "Let Lloyd get his breakfast in peace."

"I will as soon as he relieves me from the agony of curiosity which prevents me from enjoying my own breakfast," she answered. "Come, Sidney, are you not curious also?"

"Devoured by curiosity," Sidney said, low.

"Serenading me! Is that likely, Dolly, when you are here?" she said. "Besides, the Earl plays no instrument, I think. Mr. Milner is the only friend we have able to serenade us,"

"The serenading was poetical license," the young barrister interposed lightly. "My 'gay cavalier' did not serenade. He waited silently for his lady to appear."

"And did she come?"

"Yes, at last," he answered, smiling. "She was not very punctual; but he was patient, and his patience was rewarded."

"Did you see her?" asked Dolly eagerly.

"Oh, yes!" he answered. "Did I not tell you that the moon was shining? But, however charming her silver light may be for legitimate love rambles, it is not equally desirable for stolen interviews."

"This is becoming interesting," said Miss Daunt, smiling. "Stephen do you hear?"

Stephen glanced up from his letter abstractedly.

"I hear a great deal of chatter," he answered, smiling. "What is it all about?"

"Do you allow lovers' meetings in your grounds at midnight?" she asked demurely. "Because Mr. Milner was the reluctant witness of one last night."

"What does this madcap mean?" Stephen inquired, turning to his friend. "Is she talking nonsense? Did you see anything unusual in the grounds last night?"

"Something very unusual," was the laughing reply. Then Milner's tone changed to one of swift alarm. "Mrs. Daunt, is anything the matter? Are you ill?"

Three pairs of startled inquiring eyes went swiftly to the head of the table. Sidney had risen, and was supporting herself by one hand upon the table and the other on the back of the chair from which she had risen. She was pale to ghastliness, her eyes were half closed, and she seemed on the point of fainting. In an instant Stephen was by her side, but with almost equal rapidity she rallied.

"It is nothing—nothing," she declared, forcing a smile. "It is so close this morning that the heat made me feel faint. I am sorry to have startled you, Stephen," she added tremulously, her little fingers closing involuntarily over the strong hand which held hers; "but it is nothing. Indeed I am quite myself now."

She resumed her seat at the table, trying to ignore her husband's anxious eyes, and those other inquiring eyes which were so much more unpleasant to meet and so much more difficult to avoid, and waited tremulously for the conversation to continue; but her sudden illness had been effective in silencing it, and, when her companions spoke again, they had changed the subject.

Breakfast was over at last; the two young men had left the table, and were glancing over separate sheets of the local newspapers; Dolly, in her seal brown gown, was looking out of the window with a wistful look in her pretty blue eyes. In Sidney's troubled brain the thought was how she was to get to Lymouth alone and unseen. She must be doubly cautious now. Ah, why had such a cruel fate brought Lloyd Milner to Easthrope at this juncture?"

Madam Sidney."

Ah, how cruel the hot blood was that it rose so redly in her pale cheeks at Dolly's laughing heedless words! Sidney glanced nervously at Mr. Milner; but he was settling Dolly's habit, and did not see the hot vivid blush, or Sidney thought he did not, as she watched them ride away, the slender girlish figure between the two red-coated ones, leaving her free to keep her promise to Frank Greville—a promise which was to cost her very dear. Hardly had the horses disappeared down the avenue than she had rung the bell, ordered her pony carriage to be brought round with as little delay as possible, and was donning her outdoor attire with nervous little fingers which almost defeated their own haste, uneasily haunted the while by the strangely questioning, meaning look in Lloyd Milner's gray eyes. What had he seen? What did he suspect?

Sidney would have started on her mission with yet more trepidation if those questions had been truly answered, and if she could have known the result of that morning's ride.

CHAPTER XVIII.

"I'm awfully sorry I said anything about the nocturnal apparition," Lloyd Milner said confidentially to Dolly, as they rode side by side behind Stephen in a lane which was a short cut to Cotley, and which was too narrow to allow them to ride three abreast.

"Why?" asked the girl, looking upher some surprise from under the brim of the dainty riding-hat.

"I am afraid I alarmed Mrs. Daunt," he answered.

"Oh, dear, no! Sidney is not so absurdly nervous," remarked Dolly confidently, with a smile of superior knowledge. "You do not really mean that you think that made her ill this morning?"

"I fancied so."

"Oh, then you are quite mistaken!" declared Miss Daunt, nodding her wise golden head. "She does not seem very well, I think," she added, in a minute. "There has been so much visiting and going about lately that she is tired out, I dare say; and the winter always tries Sidney."

"She does not look very strong," remarked Mr. Milner.

"Oh, she is strong enough! She rarely has anything the matter with her. Stephen," she added, raising her voice as she addressed her brother, "that is not the way to Cotley. What are you thinking of?"

Stephen laughed carelessly as he turned his horse's head in another direction, and the color rose slightly in his brown cheek. He had lost himself in reverie, half bitter and half pleasant, the pleasantness being in the thought of what might have been, the bitterness in the thought of what really was. If Sidney had loved him, how happy, how nearly approaching perfection, their lives might have been! But she did not love him, and it was all a failure.

When he married her, he had hoped that by patient endeavor and tenderness and love he would win what love she had kept from the wreck of her first love-affair, he had believed that she was learning to forget Frank Greville; but on his wedding-day this belief had been torn from him, and he possessed instead—or thought he possessed—the certainty that she still believed in, still loved Frank, who, he felt was guilty of the hideous crime of which he was accused. Had he not held such a belief, he would have left no stone unturned to prove the innocence of the man whom Sidney loved, even had that innocence parted her from him—Stephen—for ever. He loved her well enough, he told himself again and again, to have made her happy at any cost. But believing as he did, he had forbidden his wife, out of very pity for her, to make any efforts to prove Frank's innocence. A close inquiry into the matter would probably only result in overwhelming proofs of his guilt; and it was better, he thought sadly, for Sidney to mourn for her lost lover and his hard fate than to know that he was unworthy either of her love or of her sorrow. There can be no greater suffering, he knew, than to know the unworthiness of one we love. This, then, was the true reason of the severe and decided prohibition which Sidney resented so bitterly, and which stood between the husband and wife like an iron wall which neither could break down, and which gave color to the terrible suspicions which were about to be implanted in the young wife's heart and almost to shipwreck her whole life.

"I wonder Mrs. Daunt does not hunt!" remarked Lloyd Milner, when they were riding abreast again.

"This is stiff country, you know," Stephen said carelessly. "Sidney is a very good horsewoman; but I am glad she does not care for hunting."

"Has she ever tried it?"

"Yes, once." Stephen said briefly, recalling the occasion with a keen pang of pain, remembering all that had taken place since then, and how in the dusk of the wintry evening he and Frank Greville had ridden up the street together and seen Sidney's slight girlish form in the window of the firelit room in the Gray House.

"Did she come to grief that she has not repeated the experiment?"

"No."

"Then I am surprised she did not do so. It is becoming so very general for ladies to hunt."

"Yes, more's the pity!" Stephen answered carelessly. "In my opinion, women are out of place in the hunting-field."

"That s an exploded notion, mon cher."

"I know that. May I ask if you intend Mrs. Milner to hunt?" Daunt inquired, laughing.

The color rose in the young barrister's cheek.

"Mrs. Milner—if ever there be such a person," he said laughingly—"will not have the chance. She will not be able to afford it."

"Nonsense! We know what big fees Q.C.'s get."

"No doubt. But Q.C.'s are few and far between."

"Here is Cotley," said Dolly, who had been silent for some minutes, and whose cheeks were very pink—possibly from the exercise. "Is it not a charming old house, Mr. Milner?"

"A fine place, decidedly," answered the young man, looking at the rose-hued cheeks with more interest than at the

The Moroccan Army.

The army of Morocco numbers several thousand soldiers, commanded by nearly as many generals and officers. The Tunisian arm seems to have served as the standard for the organization of the Moorish forces, for a more comic mixture of so ldiers can not be found in any modern opera bouffe. There are infantry, cavalry, and artillery, but without any distinction. The cavalry is permitted to ride on horseback whenever the Sultan furnishes the horses from his own stables. The artillery was established in 1862, when Sultan Mohammed received from the Spanish Government some old cannons. Four of these are still on wheels, to the great surpise of those who know the condition of the streets and roads in the Moorish capital. The uniform, if such there be, resembles the uniform of an English soldier. A quantity of old red jackets of tho Gibraltar garrison were sold on one occasion to the Moorish Government. The headwear is a fez, a turban, or a capot. The army wears slippers instead of shoes. The arms are old guns with crooked bayonets, and a few swords, lances and pistols. The soldiers are of all ages, boys of 9 or 10 years old and men with gray beards. There is no regular conscription, no limitation of service, and no systematic promotion. Boys unable to read or write become officers, even colonels, though the influence of some eunch or harem beauty. Many soldiers of comparatively superior intelligence have served for twenty or thirty years without promotion in the ranks with black Soudan negroes, Bedouins and Berbers of all colors and shades. In addition to the so-called regular army there is the black body guard of the Sultan, composed of Herculean negro slaves, and some sort of militia, called to service in case of war. The multi-colored crowd of soldiers present a ridiculous aspect but they are a most formidable foe in wars against Christians. It is neither the drilling nor the capacity of the officers which makes them so respected by the French and Spanish armies. It is their fanatical hatred and personal bravery, not to say fury. When children they are taught by their parents and Koran teachers to hate the Christians. The Moors have lost all tradition of their glorious achievements in science and arts, but they have not lost sight of the more realistic side of their past, of having possessed Spain and the entire coast of the Mediterranean Sea and her islands. Many Moorish families, although greatly mixed with the Berber and nomadic tribes of the south, bear still the proud name of some Spanish castle or city. They preserve through generations their ancient family documents, written on parchment, and even the keys to their residences in Spain, and they indulge in the hope of regaining possession of what they have lost. These thoughts inspire the Moors when fighting the Christians. They will fight and die, but will not be taken prisoners.—N. Y. Sun.

AGRICULTURAL.

The Horse for the Farm, and the Importance of Proper Training.

RURAL NEW YORKER PRIZE ESSAY

No other animal that man has domesticated, is capable of such varied and surpassing excellence as the horse. We breed and train him with special reference to speed, making him realize thousands and tens of thousands of dollars for his owner; or we breed draft horses, large and powerful; but neither of these compares in its importance with the farm horse, and if the latter is bred as carefully with reference to those qualities most valuable to the farmer, we may as surely accomplish the results desired in the farm horse as in the racer or draft horse. The fact that the United States has 11,000,000 horses shows that this branch of husbandry is of national importance, and that special attention should be given to increasing the commercial value as well as the efficiency of the horse.

The welfare of the farmer requires a horse equally adapted to the farm and road. He wants a horse of more strength and better qualities than the average of those he now has. The perfect horse for the farm and road is one possessing those combined qualities, which render him valuable for whatever duty he is required to perform, whether in the field or on the road; and this horse is the one that is docile, of good temper, quick and easily managed, with steady nerve added to strength and endurance. Good-natured, docile animals are always the best workers; the fractious horse worries more under restraint or guidance, is more liable to be abused by his driver, and consequently cannot thrive as well.

Let the farmers get sound, good-blooded colts and then make them, by training, just what they want them to be; for no animal is more susceptible to teaching than the horse, and none more ready to respond to kindness by willing obedient service. The colt is not naturally ill-tempered, and if it becomes so blame is due to some one who has handled it.

Rapid walking increases greatly the value of farm horses, and this is largely the result of training. So long have our farmers been negligent and careless in the cultivation of those qualities they most need in the horse for farm and road, that they must be educated up to their own best interests before we shall attain excellence in this direction. This will soon be accomplished when our agricultural societies and journals and Farmers' Institutas, take up the subject in earnest and persistently. In Massachusetts and a few other States an example has been set, which it would be well if all the States would imitate. It is confidently predicted that the Norman-Percheron, already a favorite in the West for farm and road, will prove equally so in New England, combining, as it does, desirable size, stamina, and all the better qualities of temper and action.

Latent Power of Manure.

Sir J. B. Lawes says, in the North British Agriculturist, that it does not follow, as a matter of course, that although the application of a manure has produced no effect upon the growing crop, it may not prove effective at some future time.

"Yes; the meet is in a field to our right."

Girls than Ours'

The notion that girls are too delicate to be useful is limited to a comparatively small part of the globe. Throughout Asia, Africa, and in large portions even of Europe and America, there prevails an old belief that they are born to labor. In Turkestan and on the Tartar steppes, the Kirghese sultanas and their daughters, and princesses in whose veins flow the blood of long lines of kings, still milk the cows and goats, and perform the menial offices of the household, as the Sanscrit maidens did six thousand years ago in the same localities. They cook, take care of the younger children, make garments, cure the skins of the wild fowl, with the feathers on, for caps, spin cotton, weave cloth, and tan leather by means of sour milk. In this delectable region the mother wears rich attire, while the daughter goes in humbler weeds, like Cinderella. If there is a piano, the mother plays on it in the front room of the tent, while the daughter brews the koumiss, stews the mutton, and broils the camel chops in the back kitchen. This is the benighted condition of patriarchal people who adhere to a nearly obsolete theory of filial duty. Similar ideas prevail throughout India, China, and among the native tribes of Siberia, who have been driven northward by aggressive neighbors. The Tungusian girl gathers the snow, melts it, makes the tea and the fish soup, sews, and, being skillful in archery, helps to keep the larder supplied with game. The Yakut and Samovede maidens, and all who dwell along the Arctic ocean, help in summer to lay up winter supplies, and in winter to perform all necessary domestic duties. The Abyssinian girl grinds corn in the simple mills in use in that country. The Kaffir girl weaves baskets and draws water. The girls in the other part of the dark continent pulverize the grain, weave mats, make earthen vessels, and are the hatters of their tribe. The theories of the tribes and nations of Asia and Africa are shared by the Indians of North and South America, who compel the young girls to learn the duties and hardships of life at an early age.

A woman's reason: "Man more constant than woman! Oh, no, Sir Peter. Look at my husband! In all things he puts his sister before his wife! Look at my brother! In all things he puts his wife before his sister! When in both cases it ought to be exactly the reverse! Now, did you ever hear anything so absurdly contradictory in all your life?" Sir Peter wisely gives in.

SCALDS AND BURNS.—Thrust the injured part immediately into cold water; this protects it from the oxygen of the air; then cover the burn with soda or with wheat flour. If severe the patient should live on tea and toast and ripe fruits.

Take a common lamp chimney—one that is flaring at the top and finished with scallops or points will make the prettiest vase—and rub it over with mucilage or "stickalive." Then take some white zephr worsted and begin at the bottom of the chimney and wind it closely around the whole of the glass. Dissolve three pounds of alum in hot water, only enough to melt the alum. Put the chimney into a tin pail a little higher (an inch or two will do) than the chimney and turn the solution of alum all over it, wetting it slowly, and filling the pail even full. Let it stand all night. In the morning lift out the vase carefully and let it dry. The alum will not break off easily, and the vase will have a bottom formed by the crystals and it will look like a piece of rock candy. If you wind the glass with Zephyr it will give a rosy shade to the crystals. If with blue they will take that shade. A wooden cross, or an anchor can be wound with worsted and dipped in strong alum water in the same way and made very ornamental for a corner bracket.

HOW TO MAKE A MANTEL VALANCE.—Very elegant mantle valances (or lamprequins can be made of crazy or mosaic patch work. Cut a strip of Canton flannel the length of the mantle, and sew the bits of velvet, silks, satins, brocades, etc., upon it to the depth of five or six inches. A very pretty way to brighten up dark pieces of silk is to paint a spray of flowers upon them or transfer embroiders of butterflies, flowers, fans or the like. Or better still, embroidery sprigs of forget-menots, pansies, snowdrops, rosebuds or any pretty flower mosaic upon the thicker cotton; lining will give it more substance, and it can then be lined with surah-silk or satin, and trimmed with a deep band of crimson, or old gold, peacock blue, or green plush running accross the bottom for a border. Then sew upon that many little pompone tassels of every imaginable hue, and you will have a beautiful valance for your mantel-piece, which will prove highly decorative. It can be nailed upon a board covered with decorative felt or plush, or it can be hung on a tiny brass pole, with gilt rings in imitation of the fashion of hanging portieres, and draperies for the windows. Similar lambrequins can be made for corner brackets and by using very small pieces of silk, and many of them of velvet and plush, the effect is very pleasing.

How Many Ties to 100 Feet?

The number of cross-ties in a mile of railway track varies largely in different roads. Every first class line has at leas 2,640, or one every two feet, and some exceed 3,200 per mile. Then, again, there is a difference on different parts of the same road. A tie, to grade, must present a clear surface of eight inches and a thickness of six inches. Sometimes ties below grade are used and the difference balanced by increased numbers.

To look back to antiquity is one thing to go back to it another. If we look back to it it should be as those who are running a race, only to press forward the faster, and to leave the beaten still further behind.

the application of a manure has produced no effect upon the growing crop, it may not prove effective at some future time. Years afterwards when perhaps all recollection of the application has passed away, or possibly when the farm has passed into other hands, some unaccountable luxuriance on certain portions of a field may indicate the burial ground of a manure which was supposed to have failed. In one of his experiments at Rothamsted, in the year 1844, about two-thirds of an acre of land was manured with a considerable amount of potash and phosphate of lime. The crop was wheat, and the produce was 15½ bushels per acre. As the land which received no manure whatever yielded a crop of 15 bushels per acre, it was evident that the manure had practically failed. In the following year salts of ammonia were applied, and the produce was 37½ bushels per acre.

Our cousins across the border in Ontario, Canada are bestirring themselves in good time for the conservation of their timber. In that Province the total area of timber land runs up to 130,000,000 acres Of this only about 10,000,000 have been partially cleared; yet there is a bill now before the Canadian Parliament for the encouragement of tree planting, offering a bonus of not over 25 cents for each of certain specified species planted along a highway or a farm boundary line, or within six feet of such line. The trees along the highways are to be the property of the owners of the land, but they must not be removed without permission from the authorities. There are some things which even we Americans can learn from our neighbors.—Rural New Yorker.

Swallows and Cholera.

It has been stated again and again that swallows desert a district infected with cholera. The cholera correspondent of the Times says that "it is certain that there are none just now in Marseilles." Biologists appear to have hitherto regarded the statement as a popular fancy, but I think it worthy of better treatment. The idea that the bird has a mysterious instinct by which it divines the evil and avoids it is, of course, absurd; but there may be other very good and practical reasons, from a swallow's point of view, for leaving any place where the virus abounds. We know that swallows feed chiefly on gnats, and also that by far the longest period of gnat life is spent in the water. The gnat is a winged air-wandering creature only during the last brief breeding state of its existence. During all its growing life it is an aquatic animal: the egg floats on the surface of the water; the pupa is a twisting, jerking, jointed, worm-like creature, living and feeding in the water, though breathing air through a tube, which it thrusts above the surface; the big headed, wriggling, tufted larva lives in a like manner, and elaborates within it the winged creature that merely merges to perform parental duties in air and die. As cholera is propagated by polluted water, there is nothing unreasonable in supposing that such pollution is inimical to gnat life, and if so, the disappearance of the swallows is at once explained. They naturally desert the place from which their food supples are cut off.—The Gentleman's Magazine.

FASHION NOTES.

Very odd is the notion of a seaside hat, the Neptune, the fancy of a Paris milliner. It is a large capote of gray-green rushes, burdened around the brim with gray-green plush, and on one side an aquatic miniature landscape composed of water-plants and sea weeds, a pretty pink-lined shell, and a small green frog dressed in green velvet and pale yellow silk, with great melancholy eyes looking at you through the rushes.

Embroidered bretelles, or, prettie still, those made of lace and net, wide on the shoulders and tapering to a point at the belt, front and back, over the bodice, are again in vogue. These graceful additions are always becoming, relieving as they do the severity of a plain waist. Bodice of opaque white, in cashmere, nun's veiling, or even silk, are never pretty at the back unless the blank out lines are softened by some suchaccessory. Lace berthas and fichus, so long worn, are now giving place to bretelles, which are still more chic and graceful.

There will be a rage this season for the small French capote bonnet made of black velvet, black satin covered with escurial or beaded Spanish lace, and not a few of fine French felt in all the new deep, rich shades to match the costume. Wall flowers, nasturtiums, or shaded geranium blossoms, each made of silk velvet, are set in large clusters on one side of the crown. Upon some very stylish looking gypsy hats of the darkest green velvet are coneets of orange colored nasturtiums, mingled with sprays of pale-green maiden-hair fern.

The display of wash materials is unusually large this season, and the fabrics and colorings were never more beautiful. Paler shades are more noticeable than formerly, and in fabrics of chambery, gingham, parcale, sateen, organdie, and French muslin, the new dyes rival the tintings of the most delicate silks and satins. Especially blue, dove-gray, corn, and pink. The sateens, with their brilliant gloss, when stylishly made up and trimmed with edgings of fine Torchon lace, look quite as rich as silk. They wash admirably, and with little care will last two seasons.

Some of the newest bridal dresses of white satin have the trains garnished with an embroidery of white velvet ribbon work and white chenille appliques in heavy raised designs about six inches wide, which border the entire train. In front, the tablier literally disappears under a network of chenille flowers, waves of lace, and dainty wreaths and clusters in ribbon work, deftly and beautifully intermingled. One magnificent dress of milk-white Ture satin is decorated with a marvelous embroidery in chenille of golden rosebuds and pale plush roses. Another of cream-white satin, has the train and petticoat garnished with Marguerites in chenille pale-blue forget-me-nots in raised silk embroidery.

The magpie fashion of wearing a mixture of black and white which has been in such vogue for two seasons past seems likely to remain a fashionable color combination even long after the conditions of "court mourning" have been fulfilled. A

DOMESTIC RECIPES.

Wash and scrape, boil until tender, cut into quarters of convenient length, and cover with vinegar. It is the best way to prepare carrots for the table.

MILK TOAST.—A good way to dispose of dry bread is to make it into milk toast. It is very popular with the working men and children, and often solves the problem that disturbs the cook when she is thinking what is to be got for supper. Toast the bread a short time before it is wanted. Set a half pan of milk on the stove and let it get scalding hot. Put in a little salt, spread the toasted slices with butter and put them into the hot milk, and in a very few minutes remove to the table. If the toast is put in too soon, the bread will fall in pieces and is not so nice to serve. There should be plenty of milk for the amount of bread.

BREAD PUDDING.—A pudding may be made of the small pieces of bread, if the family taste does not rebel. The bread should be broken fine, covered with milk, and set on the stove where it is not too hot, until it becomes soft. Remove and stir in a tablespoonful of sugar, one of butter, a small teaspoonful of salt, also a pinch of cinnamon, or allspice, and, if liked, a half teacup of chopped raisins, or dried raspberries. When cool enough, stir in a egg, well beaten, and bake an hour in a moderate oven. To be eaten with cream and sugar, or pudding sauce, as preferred. I knew a lady who kept all the broken pieces of bread in a bag, that was hung where they would dry and not mold, and she had the material for a pudding always at hand. The price of flour and cost of living would determine whether such economies would pay. Where wheat is a dollar a bushel, home raised, there is no waste in giving broken pieces to the fowls. But it is often a convenience, as well as a duty, to look after small savings.

QUINCE MARMALADE.—Pare, core, slice, and weigh the fruit, stewing the skins and cores, in a dish by themselves, with water enough to just cover. When the parings are tender, turn into a cloth bag, and squeeze out every drop of juice; put the quinces into the kettle, pour over the juice, cover, and let cook slowly, stirring and mashing with a wooden spoon until the pieces have become a smooth paste. Now add three-quarters of a pound of white sugar to each pound of the fruit, boil ten minutes longer, stirring constantly. Remove from the fire, turn into jelly-jars and tie down.

RIPE TOMATO PRESERVES.—Select the yellow egg tomato, peel and weigh out seven pounds, add six pounds of sugar and let stand over-night. Drain off the syrup, let boil, skimming carefully. Put in the tomatoes and boil 20 minutes. Take out the fruit with a skimmer and put into jars, boil the syrup until it thickens, adding the juice of three lemons just before you pour it over the fruit. Seal or tie up.

SWEET PICKLED TOMATOES.—Select the husk, or strawberry tomato. Take seven pounds of the fruit, four pounds of white sugar, a pint of good cider vinegar, mace, cinnamon and cloves tied up in a bag. Pick the fruit, and put with the sugar into a preserving kettle; heat to a boil, add the vinegar and spice, boil five minutes,

The Woman Question in Europe.

A book of no common interest as a record of social progress has recently appeared under the title of "The Woman Question in Europe." It consists of original essays by writers who are authorities on the special subjects of which they treat. The topics embraced under the general title include woman's progress in education, in the professions, in industrial opportunities, in legal rights and in the suffrage, and each country of Europe is brought in turn under review. So impressive a showing of woman's capacity so humiliating an exhibition of the arbitrary limitations imposed upon her by the stronger sex, and so many hopeful indications of larger and better things in the future, it is safe to say were never brought together between one set of book cover before. England has been thought very slow in her recognition of the public and professional claims of women, and with justice, but in these, as in other matters, the English have a plodding persistency which accomplishes great things in the long stretch. The agitation for the extension of suffrage to woman first began in Great Britain in connection with the discussion of the reform bill of 1867. Municipal suffrage was granted in 1869, and in 1870 the act was passed conferring on women householders the power to vote at school board elections and qualifying them to sit as members of school boards, a qualification that has been availed of by increasingly large numbers. Parliamentary suffrage still remains to be worked for, and it comes up anew in each successive session. Meanwhile the Isle of Man, which has its independent Legislature, has given women all the voting powers that men enjoy, and the experiment is considered to have proved in a high degree satisfactory.

More important than the suffrage, as many readers will think, are the educational movements, and those looking to the enlarging of professional and industrial opportunities. Dense crusts of prejudice had to be broken through before these could make headway, but they have now acquired an impetus that nothing is likely to check. At the conservative universities of Cambridge and Oxford, as well as at the University of London, young women can enjoy every educational advantage that young men are offered, and win substantially the same honors. In the medical profession such names as Dr. Elizabeth Blackwell, Dr. Elizabeth Garrett Anderson, and Dr. Frances Elizabeth Hoggan, are among its distinguished ornaments, and a complete medical training, which for many years an English woman could obtain only by going to Paris or Germany, is now open to her at London. In the other European countries progress out of the mediæval condition, or rather that worse than mediæval condition of women which the revolutionary era created by destroying chivalry before intellectual quickening had begun, is only in its birth stages. It is by studying the unhappy lot of women in France, Germany, Spain and Russia that one comes to a vivid realization of their relatively high position in England and America. More than by all else will one be impressed by the fact that moral progress has been greatest where legal recognition and the enlarge-duration even long after the conditions of "court mourning" have been fulfilled. A lady writing from England to a friend in New York states that at Goodwood recently the princess of Wales and her sister-in-law, the crown princess of Prussia, wore mixtures of this kind. The latter lady dressed entirely in dead-black silk, with an ivory-white silk bonnet with white plumes. The princess of Wales wore a dress skirt of black and white striped satin, with a black satin brocaded overdress with white satin waist coat, and a bonnet glittering with cut jet ornaments.

AYER'S
Cherry Pectoral.

No other complaints are so insidious in their attack as those affecting the throat and lungs: none so trifled with by the majority of sufferers. The ordinary cough or cold, resulting perhaps from a trifling or unconscious exposure, is often but the beginning of a fatal sickness. AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL has well proven its efficacy in a forty years' fight with throat and lung diseases, and should be taken in all cases without delay.

A Terrible Cough Cured.

"In 1857 I took a severe cold, which affected my lungs. I had a terrible cough, and passed night after night without sleep. The doctors gave me up. I tried AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL, which relieved my lungs, induced sleep, and afforded me the rest necessary for the recovery of my strength. By the continued use of the PECTORAL a permanent cure was effected. I am now 62 years old, hale and hearty, and am satisfied your CHERRY PECTORAL saved me.
HORACE FAIRBROTHER."
Rockingham, Vt., July 15, 1882.

Croup.—A Mother's Tribute.

"While in the country last winter my little boy, three years old, was taken ill with croup; it seemed as if he would die from strangulation. One of the [illegible] suggested the use of AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL, a bottle of which was always kept in the house. This was tried in small and frequent doses, and to our delight in less than half an hour the little patient was breathing easily. The doctor said that the CHERRY PECTORAL had saved my darling's life. Can you wonder at our gratitude? Sincerely yours,
MRS. EMMA GEDNEY."
159 West 128th St., New York, May 16, 1882.

"I have used AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL in my family for several years, and do not hesitate to pronounce it the most effectual remedy for coughs and colds we have ever tried. A. J. CRANE."
Lake Crystal, Minn., March 13, 1882.

"I suffered for eight years from Bronchitis, and after trying many remedies with no success, I was cured by the use of AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL. JOSEPH WALDEN."
Byhalia, Miss., April 5, 1882.

"I cannot say enough in praise of AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL, believing as I do that but for its use I should long since have died from lung troubles. F. BRAGDON."
Palestine, Texas, April 22, 1882.

No case of an affection of the throat or lungs exists which cannot be greatly relieved by the use of AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL, and it will always cure when the disease is not already beyond the control of medicine.

A French Baby Farm.

A Parisian paper gives an account of a high-class baby farm known as Les Oublettes, near Charenton. The writer says: "The good woman who takes care of them said, 'That is the son of a great lady. When she pays a visit here her carriage stops at the Jardin des Plantes; thence she takes a cab here. I have three children belonging to wives separated from their husbands, another is the son of the Marquis de——— by a friend of his wife's. That little fellow who seems so sad, and is now engrossed in making a sand pie by the steps, has never received a visit. His name is Ivan, and his mother is Russian. He looks wistfully at the others when their friends comes, as it were, to gather up the crumbs of the caresses lavished on them. One day a lady embraced him and brought tears of joy to his eyes. When she went away Ivan said to his companion 'Won't you give me a little bit of your mama?'

A Great Drought.

Richard A. Proctor says that the age of the earth is placed by some at 500,000,000 years, and still others of later time, among them the Duke of Argyll, places it at 10,000,000 years. None place it lower than 10,000,000 years, knowing what processes have been gone through. The earth must have become old. Newton surmises, although he could give no reason for it, that the earth would at one time become perfectly dry. Since then it has been found that Newton was correct. As the earth keeps cooling it will become porous, and great cavities will be formed in the interior which will take in the water. It is estimated that this process is now in progress so far that the water diminishes at the rate of the thickness of a sheet of writing paper a year. At this rate in 9,000,000 years the water will have sunk a mile, and in 15,000,000 years every trace of water will have disappeared from the face of the globe.

Among the graceful gilets, now so fashionably worn with nearly every sort of dress, are dainty ones made of white silk and embroidered down the front and on the wide pocket flaps with small flowers like arbutus, lilies of the valley, or small carnation pinks or wrought entirely with white silk rose buds outlined with tiny mother-o'-pearl beads. These vests are very stylish and elegant, and can be worn with many different toilets.

that moral progress has been greatest where legal recognition and the enlargement of intellectual and professional opportunities has been greater. Not in England, but in France under the barbarous code of Napoleon, and in Spain, is society honeycombed by the moral degeneracy of women. The thesis that for the well being of humanity women should not know too much is not borne out by facts any more than it is by reason.—Domestic Monthly.

A Novel Cure for Shying Horses.

"Does your horse shy, boss?" asked a small colored boy of an American reporter who was driving along the Lebanon pike in a buggy. Being anxious to know what the boy meant, the reporter pulled in his horse and told him that the animal he drove had the bad habit he referred to. "Din I kin git you sumfin what'll cure him for a nickel," said the boy. The reporter handed over the nickel, and the boy produced from the confines of his capacious pocket a small chameleon, evidently much the worse for wear, but still alive. Handing it to the reporter, the boy told him to take the lizard and keep it until the full of the next moon, when it was to be boiled to nothing in a pint of water. "What then?" said the reporter, "Why yeu just take an' 'uint (anoint) de eyes of yo' hawse wid it and he won't shy no mo." The reporter thought that the boy had fallen upon a shrewd way to beat him out of 5 cents, but he learned upon inquiry that it is quite a well-grounded belief among many of the negroes who live upon farms in this State that the treatment recommended by the colored boy will cure horses and mules of the trick of shying, and is often resorted to by negroes living in this section.—Nashville American.

Never Made a Failure.

"I have never made a failure of anything I ever undertook," said the seedy individual, as he answered to call of "have a drink!"

"Your appearance belies your statement," said the other. "How is it that you are in such a ragged state, if you never made a failure of anything you undertook?"

"Because," sadly smiled the other, wiping his lips, "because everything I've attempted was a failure before I took hold of it."

nent sanitarians insist that cellar should never be constructed under dwelling houses; but if our houses are already built and we must for convenience make use of the cellars, we should keep them scrupulously clean from all decaying substances, give their walls a frequent co of whitewash, secure good drainage, and above all open the outside door and windows wide every day during warm weather, and every week at least during the winter, thus effecting a free interchange of air.

Youthful rashness skips like a hare over the meshes of good counsel.

Not another Pill shall go down my throat again, said [illegible] "when I can get such a prompt and pleasant [illegible] for my Bilious attacks, such as Dr. Carson's Stomach Bitters. It renders the Blood Pure and Cool and [illegible] a splendid Spring Medicine. Large bottles 50 cents

A True Incident.

Some time ago the children's ward for incurables, in one of the large hospitals, was frequently visited by a young lady, who took great interest in the little ones. Meeting the nurse, one day on entering, she asked:

"Are there any new ones since my last visit?"

"Two, I think. One brought in yesterday. Been run over—she's very bad, too."

After speaking to several, whose eyes brightened at her coming, the lady stood by the cot where the maimed little body lay. The great pathetic eyes lifted so appealingly to hers, moved her strangely.

"What can I do for you, my dear? Is there something you would like to have?"

"Yes'm a parasol."

"A parasol! but my child you could not use it here, you know. Had you not rather have a pretty doll, and some nice fruit?"

"No'm, I'd rather have a parasol—a lacy one—more'n any other thing."

"Very well, I'll bring you one to-morrow," and giving her a pretty picture, she went away: but that strange fancy haunted her, and after returning home, and fearing that the little life might slip away before the morrow, she asked one of her brothers to go out with her to make the purchase, as it was nearly dusk.

"Just like Mary," he laughingly said. "If the child had asked for the moon she would have been devising some plan to get it for her. Suppose we buy a box of flannels to send to India same time, Mary."

Parasols were out of season, and the clerk looked so amazed when she asked for them that she felt obliged to explain.

"I think we have a very few expensive ones laid by," he said.

After some delay they were brought, when one daintily-lined, lace-trimmed was selected; and bought for five dallars: then proceeding to the hospital, she sent the beautiful gift up to the child.

"I never saw anything like it," the nurse said next day to the giver. "She laughed and cried, and hugged and kissed it, and it has really seemed to make her forget her pain."

Nearly a week the child lingered, and then with her wasted hand grasping the dainty handle the little waif—who had found both Life and Death so hard—passed away to the Happy Land where all desires are satisfied.

The parasol was then given to another little girl, and when she died to another, until it was owned by seven in the ward, most of whom had never had the delight of holding one in their hands before; so, although the gift was neither meat nor drink, medicine nor care, it was a most gracious charity.

A Hebrew Girl's Dowry

Settling the dowry is one of the most important parts of a Hebrew engagement. Very few Hebrew girls marry now without $1,000 to $50,000. Sometimes there is some difficulty in arranging this. The proposed bride's father offers $5,000, and the proposed groom's father thinks it is not enough. They argue, wrangle, bargain, and finally compromise. No written agreement is taken, but it is officially

A Question.

How can we raise more corn to the acher? Why, of course, by using PUTNAM'S CORN EXTRACTOR. Putnam's Painless Corn Extractor has given universal satisfaction, for it is sure, safe and painless. Like every article of real merit it has a host of imitators, and we would specially warn the public to guard against those dangerous substitutes offered for the genuine Putnam's Extractor. N. C. The judicious planting eucalyptus trees has been recommended by Baron Von Mueller as a means of increasing and maintaining the water-supply of Australia. These trees—known also as the "blue gum" trees—are credited with remarkable power of collecting and absorbing water, and of condensing into water the moisture in the air.

the proposed groom's father thinks it is not enough. They argue, wrangle, bargain, and finally compromise. No written agreement is taken, but it is officially given out that on the wedding day so much, say $7,000, will be paid down in hard cash to the bridegroom, before the ceremony takes place. Here is where some sharp practice occasionally comes in. The bride's father, after he is assured that the groom is in love with his daughter, tries to beat down the dowry, and the groom holds him to his expressed intention. An instance occurred here recently in which a Boston Hebrew fell in love with one of the pretty Brooklyn Hebrew young ladies. He became engaged, and $10,000 was promised him with the girl. On the marriage day he came to her house with his friends. The money was not forthcoming, and he was met with repeated explanations and excuses. He held to his verbal bond, but finding that the intention of the bride's father was actually to give him much less than had been agreed upon, he made excuses that he wished to be shaved and left the bridal party. Once out of the house he secured a hack, drove to the New York Central Railway Station, and took the first train for Boston; no persuasion could afterwards bring him back.—Brooklyn Eagle,

Catarrh—A New Treatment.

Perhaps the most extraordinary success that has been achieved in modern science has been attained by the Dixon Treatment of Catarrh. Over 2,000 patients treated during the past six months, fully ninety per cent. have been cured of this stubborn malady. This is none the less startling when it is remembered that not five per cent. of the patients presenting themselves to the regular practitioner are benefitted, while the patent medicines and other advertised cures never record a cure at all. Starting with the claim now generally believed by the most scientific men that the disease is due to the presence of living parasites in the tissues, Mr. Dixon at once adopted his cure to their extermination; this accomplished the catarrh is practically cured, and the permanency is unquestioned, as cures effected by him four years ago are cures still. No one else has ever attempted to cure catarrh in this manner, and no other treatment has ever cured catarrh. The application of the remedy is simple and can be done at home, and the present season of the year is the most favorable for a speedy and permanent cure, the majority of cases being cured at one treatment. Sufferers should correspond with Messrs. A. H. DIXON & SON, 305 King-street West, Toronto, Canada, and enclose stamp for their treatise on catarrh.—Montreal Star.

"What does your husband call you by?" said a bride to a friend who had been married several years. "Does he call you ducky or lovey? My darling calls me ducky." "Does he? Mine used to call me popsey-wopsey, but he doesn't use that term now." "What does he call you then?" "He calls me, 'say there.'"

A young man had his girl out carriage-riding the other evening and the horses took fright and ran away. In turning a corner the vehicle was overturned and the young lady was pinned to the earth, the body of the carriage lying heavily across her waist. She was rendered unconscious. When she was released from her perilous position, she slowly opened her eyes as consciousness returned, and faintly gasped: "Don't—squeeze—me—quite—so—hard—next—time—John."

Vandalism on John Street.

The residents on this street contemplate the organization of a vigilance committee to punish ruffians who commit depredations on their property. Last spring Mr. M. Parrott had several trees girdled, and only a few nights ago two fine trees were pulled up by the roots and at the same time the tops of several fancy pickets were pulled of the fences of Mr. A. W. Grange and Mr. Thos. Symington. A stop should be put to this vandalism.

Presented With a Purse.

Mr. Harry Reid, engineer, for thirteen years an employee of the G. T. R., and for five years on the pilot engine, has severed his connection with that road and accepted a position on the Napanee, Tamworth & Quebec Railway as conductor. He was agreeably surprised on Saturday night when Messrs. Dunnett of the Shedden Company; Smith, engine driver; and Nicholson, telegraph operator, went to his house in Kingston and presented him with a purse of $100, contributed by the Grand Trunk men and merchants of that city in consideration of the courtesy he had shown them in the despatch of business. Mr. Reid made a short reply, thanking his friends for their kind consideration and assuring them that he would never forget it.

A Painful Accident.

Reuben Woodhames, a young man of some twenty years, son of Mr. James Woodhames, sec. master at Ernesttown station, met with a dreadful accident on Saturday evening last while working with a gang of men at the station, by which he suffered amputation of one leg at the ankle, and the loss of a part of his other foot, thus rendering him a cripple for life. The men were employed in relaying anew the track at the station on the south side of the road, and the section master had given orders to the switchman to switch wholly on the north side in order that the men might not be hindered at their work, and the switchman had done so during the day, but on the approach of the eastern express he shifted the switch to the south side without warning the men employed. On the approach of the express, poor Reub. thought it would be ran on the main line and while warning the men to look out, he stepped with one foot over the south switch and was caught by the express and hurled to the ground with the result as above given.

—Messrs. L. A. Magurn and T. West, Belleville bicyclists, arrived in town Tuesday evening and left for Kingston Wednesday morning to take part in the bicycle races in that city.

—R. P. Lahey's for the cheapest and best tweed suit.

—The plate glass is now in the Campbell House block and the stores are being pushed to completion. Scott Bros., barbers, will occupy their new premises next week. They will be elegantly furnished.

—Mr. Sheriff Pruyn requests us to state that the money for the payment of deputy-returning officers for services in the recent election has arrived, and he desire that they should call at his office as early as possible and receive their allowances.

—Gent's furnishings in endless variety at McAlister's.

—Messrs. Gibbard & Son are supplying elegant furniture for the new rooms in the Campbell House. A large number of the rooms are now completed. When all are furnished the hotel will be the most commodious and complete in the district.

—For correct styles in new fall hats and caps, go to R. P. Lahey's.

—Prof. McDonald will close his dancing class here in the course of a couple of weeks, when he goes to Montreal where he will with the assistance of his son, open classes in Queen's Hall for the winter months. At the close of the quarter here he will, as a grand finale, give an assembly.

—The drawing for the organ takes place at McAlister's on Tuesday, October 7th, at 5 p.m. Be there.

—The half yearly celebration of the Lord's supper will be held in the 8th concession church, Camden, next Sabbath. The service will begin at 11 o'clock a.m. Members of other churches are cordially invited to participate in the blessed sacrament. The Rev. Mr. Smith will preach in Tamworth on Sabbath.

—Visitors to the show will find the cheapest clothing, hats, caps, furs, and men's furnishings at R. P. Lahey's.

—A partridge a few days ago flew into the residence of John T. Grange, Esq., West-st., and every day flocks of wild geese are to be seen crossing over the town. Is this an indication of game being plentiful, or are the feathery songsters of the primeval indulging in bravado over our local nimrods, and insinuating that they are harmless?

—Do Not Forget that if you are wanting Machine Oil, Axle Grease, Leather Belting, or anything in threshing furnishing H. W. Perry's is the place to call. A full line of building hardware.

—Miss Allen, dressmaker, will remove to the new Leonard block about the second week in October. In the meantime she will be glad to see customers at her residence, corner of West and Mill Streets. She has received the fall and winter plates and is prepared to do dress and mantle making in the best possible manner. 2ins

—Mr. John Blewett has erected a brick smoke house in the rear of his store on Dundas-st. and will this season smoke the hams and bacon he sells in his store. This will ensure nicely smoked fresh meats. The smoke house is commodious and well adapted for the purpose. Lovers of smoked meats should make a note of this.

—Sermons in behalf the Educational Society will be preached in the Eastern Methodist Church on Sabbath, the 12th instant. In the morning it is expected that an eminent minister of the connection will preach. In the evening the celebrated pulpit orator, the Rev. Dr. Douglas of Montreal, will occupy the pulpit. Fuller announcement will be made next week.

—Dr. J. D. Stewart, the well known oculest and aurist, died at Belleville last week from paralysis. He had been under treatment by electricity in an eastern city when his condition became much worse and he was brought home to Belleville, where a short time after his arrival he had the fatal attack. He leaves a wife and daughter, both of whom are well known and esteemed in Napanee, Mrs. Stewart being a daughter of Mr. Abel Yates of this town.

—One of the waiter girls of the Brisco House had a narrow escape from being burned to death Wednesday morning. She was standing near the stove when her dress caught fire. She was nearly enveloped in the flames, when some of the other girls promptly seized a couple of pails of water, which were near by, and threw it over her. Fortunately she escaped with but slight injury, her hands being the only portion of her body any way seriously burned.

—Ellen Nora Fernia, the young girl committed to gaol last week by the Mayor for prostitution and vagrancy, was on Monday ordered by His Honor Judge Wilkison to be transferred to the Girls' Industrial Refuge at Toronto for a period not exceeding five years. This institution is in connection with the Mercer Institute, and is a reformatory for young girls who have fallen. They are discharged as soon as they prove themselves able to lead a virtuous life. This is the first commitment to the Refuge from this county.

—The judges of the prize farm competition arranged by the Agricultural and Arts Association of the province, have handed in their report. They report favorably on the majority of the farms visited and the evidences of progress in husbandry which they witnessed. Among the prizes we notice that John Sharp, Esq., reeve of Ernesttown, was awarded a bronze medal for his farm which contains 200 acres and is situated on the Bath road, ten miles south-east of Napanee. Mr. John Wilmot's farm, township of Pittsburgh, was also awarded a prize medal.

—Remember the Tavernier Dramatic Company in the Opera House next Monday and Tuesday evenings. The company have been playing in Ottawa during the provincial exhibition and drew large audiences. All the papers write in their praise. The Citizen says, "They beyond question deserved the frequent plaudits which were tendered to their really first-class rendition of the various parts assigned to the caste." In order to give our citizens an opportunity to inspect the display in the palace and at the same time attend the theatre, the curtain will not rise Monday night till half past eight o'clock. Reserved seats now on sale at J. J. Perry's drug store.

—The St. Quinten Opera Co. gave two excellent performances in the Opera House on Friday and Saturday evenings. The bill first night was "La Mascotte," and to say that it was most delightful but properly describes its rendition. Miss St. Quinten's "Bettina" was probably the cleverest representation of a character ever witnessed here, while Mr. Wolff as "Prince Lorenzo" from from the outset kept the audience bubbling over with laughter by his drollery and witty "gags." Miss Marcellus sustained the part of the "Fiametta" with much ability and Mr. Reid Wilson as "Rocco" was more than funny. Several of the members of the Company being afflicted with bad colds, the singing of the support was not up to expectations, though the music all round was very satisfactory. Saturday night "Olivette" was presented and the same high degree of merit shown in the first performance was sustaintained. Should the Company return they will be greeted with larger audiences, the deficiency in this respect being caused by the inclement weather.

thought it would be ran on the main line and while warning the men to look out, he stepped with one foot over the south switch and was caught by the express and hurled to the ground with the result as above given. Considerable indignation is expressed against the switchman for not warning the men of the change of switch. Drs. Ruttan, Price and Meacham were summoned and attended to the wounded man, who passed through the ordeal with great firmness.

Mr. Abel Yates' Drama.

We clip the subjoined advertisement from the New York Clipper. It will be seen from it that Mr. Yates has his play completed and ready for the boards. The adv. is written in Abel's own quaint way and as an item of local interest we reproduce it :—

A CARD TO MANAGERS

Of Successful, Critical and Speculative Character.

I am poor (it's a crime); I am unknown as author, (that mars merit, if any); but I have written and got copyright to a new Drama I think, with smooth, fair talent, nicely selected and duly managed, would please from peasant to prince. The plot is laid in California. It's a Tragi-Comedy in four acts. Title, VIOLETS, OR JASPER LUCKINGS, THE KANUCK LANDLORD AND CALIFORNIA GARDENER.

Cast of Characters :

Nellie.....Orphan and Violet Girl
Ruth.....Widow
Eliza.....Niece of Ruth
Rachel.....Joe's Wife
Alonzo.....Villain
Jack.....Gambler
Joe.....From Jarsey
Merrill.....Wells Fargo's Bank Agent
Kit Welch.....At the Willows
Kentuck and Hoosier.....At Cherokee Ravine
Jasper....Kanuck Landlord and California Gardener

Nine stage people (three are explained). I am no Diamond, but if managed right might make a fair Jasper. I never saw Pat Rooney but once (bar self-eulogy). He said I'd down 'em all. I never saw Billy Emmett but once. He said hurry up my piece and come to the front, for I am getting old. I am tired being called Alvin—for nothing, when I can't change my looks. What good manager will correspond with the idea, if there is merit, by shaping and shaking out sufficient to place before the public for true verdict? Address ABEL YATES, Box 253, Cape Vincent, N. Y., or Napanee, Ontario, Canada. Either place will catch me.

Grand Concert and Tea at Tamworth.

The Presbyterians of Tamworth give a grand tea and concert on Tuesday evening next, the 7th inst., in the town hall of that enterprising little town. The Presbyterians have had the reputation of giving a first-class bill of fare in past years, but this year they are determined to excell all previous entertainments. They have secured the able services of Prof. Heath to preside at the organ, while Messrs. Crumley, Middleton and Galloway of Kingston will keep the audience laughing and crying almost simultaneously with their side-splitting eccentricities. In addition Mr. and Mrs. D. E. Rose, whose services have been so much appreciated in past years, will also endeavour to be present on the occasion, and Miss Wagar, who has just returned from California, an excellent songstress, will sing a couple of songs. The Revs. A. Young of Napanee and Depew of Tamworth, and John W. Bell, Esq., M.P., will deliver addresses. The tea will be served at 7.30; concert to begin at 8.30. This will give an opportunity for those who have been attending the show at Napanee and coming home hungry to come right down from the train and have their tea and enjoy themselves the balance of the evening. The tickets which are only 30c., remember, admits to both tea and concert.

Photograph Gallery at Newburgh.

DISTRICT NEWS.

—B. McMahon of the Edinburgh Hotel, Kingston, has purchased the Anglo-American from Geo. Hoggard, Belleville.

—Dr. Tuttle's office and Wright's store at Tweed were entered by burglars on Saturday night and some money and promissory notes stolen.

—Friday morning ten bicyclists rode into Kingston from Gananoque. They were members of the Toronto Bicycle Club westward bound. They have been on a visit to Ottawa. They passed through Napanee on Saturday.

—On Saturday afternoon, as Mr. H. C. Kennedy of Morrisburgh, and his sister, Mrs. Urquhart, were returning from a visit to Frankford their horse, frightened by the approach of a train, bolted and the buggy upset. One of Mr. Kennedy's arms was dislocated, and he received several cuts on the head and bruises on the body. Mrs. Urquhart was also bruised considerably. Mr. Kennedy went home by the midnight train.

—The temperance men of Kingston district held a temperance meeting on the 25th inst., at Glenvale, under the auspices of the Sydenham Blue Ribbon Association. There were fifteen speekers. The Scott Act was discussed and strong reasons advanced for the passage of the Act in Frontenac. A motion made to the effect that application be had for the submission of the Act to the people was carried. A committee was named to take the management of the matter. It meets here on Thursday to arrange details and discuss the advisability of testing the popularity of the Act in the city.

—At Kingston, on Friday evening last, a woman got in a G. T. R. car, bound east. She held her baby up to the window, near Wales. Suddenly it dropped from her hands and disappeared. The woman frantically jumped out of the car after it, the train's speed being about forty miles an hour. It was stopped as soon as possible and a freight train notified to pick up the mangled remains of the woman and child, as it was not expected that they were alive. Both were found, however, alive and but little the worse of the episode through which they had passed.

—John Frall, John Henry Zufelt and Mary Ann Harrigan were before J. J. B. Flint, on Friday last at Belleville, for a preliminary examination on a charge of burglariously entering the house of Mr. H. B. Rathbun, Deseronto, on the night of the 29th of July and stealing silverware to the value of $700. Mr. H. B. Rathbun, jr., and Mr. John Croft identified portions of the silver found with the gang as part of that which belonged to Mr. Rathbun and had been stolen. About twenty witnesses appeared from Deseronto and the members of the gang were committed to stand their trial. The prisoners exhibited nervousness on hearing the decision.

LENNOX FALL SHOW.

THE FINEST EXHIBITION EVER HELD IN THE COUNTY.

GOOD WEATHER--LARGE ATTENDANCE.

Splendid Financial Result.

The exhibition held by the Lennox Agricultural Society on Monday and Tuesday last was the finest in the history of the Society. The weather of both days was exceptionally fine—Nature seeming to guide on and approve the efforts of the efficient board of directors to make the exhibition a success. The membership roll showed an increase of over one hundred over last year, the total being 402, and the gate receipts of the two days figured up the remarkable sum of $997.95, at a fee of 15c. The result of all this is that the Society's finances are in a highly flourishing condition that will enable it to pay the cost of improving the race course and fences, besides a sum close on $1,000 on the grounds, which the Society have lately taken out of the hands of the stock company. The grounds and buildings are now in a much better condition than ever, while the race track, which has been enlarged to about a third of a mile, is a great improvement on that previously used. The credit for this state of affairs is largely due to the efficient Secretary, Dr. Reid, who was ably assisted by President Allan and Wm. Miller, Esq., Treasurer; and in fact by all the members of the board of directors.

The First Day.

The morning of Monday was devoted to receiving the exhibits and allotting positions. The scene inside the palace was rendered lively by the sound of the hammer and saw, and the general bustle usual on occasions of this kind among exhibitors in getting their wares in order. Outside, the vendors of refreshments were engaged in the erection of booths, while the fakirs usually to be found on fair grounds were busy preparing for the harvest they expected to reap on the morrow. The feature of the day was the horse-races, and this attracted a large attendance in the afternoon. The races were conducted under the supervision of the President of the Society, Chief Allen, and the Judges were Mr. G. Drummond, Rome, N.Y., Mr. Jesse Johnston, Bath, and Mr. A, Dunbar, Kingston. The first race, that for stallions, was called shortly after 2 p.m. The entries were Potter & Williams' "Glenelg," Templeton & Beeman's "Legacy" and John Ward's "Rattler," and the race was best two in three heats. This was the most interesting event of the day, the rival horses "Legacy" and "Glenelg" being pitted against one another. "Legacy" was driven by H.

best two in three heats. This was the most interesting event of the day, the rival horses "Legacy" and "Glenelg" being pitted against one another. "Legacy" was driven by H. Covert, of Belleville, a professional driver, while Mr. Wilson Huff drove "Glenelg," and both horses looked well. The first heat was won by "Legacy;" the second by "Glenelg," who though not coming in first was awarded it for fair and square trotting, and he also took the third heat. "Legacy" labored hard in the last heat and when he came to the pole was bleeding profusely at the nose. It proved to be only a small vein in the nostrils that had broken. People were astonished at the speed and fine trotting action of "Glenelg," which up to a few weeks ago had no training whatever; while disappointment was everywhere expressed with the performance of "Legacy." After making all due allowance for his superfluous fat, which rendered him in no condition for trotting, they did not find the speed they had been led to believe he possessed, while his action was abominable. He ran with his hind feet and trotted with his front, which made a very awkward gait, while his frequent breaks rendered it questionable whether he trotted half the distance. "Rattler" took the third the third prize.

The second race was for the "Farmers' Premium," $53 contributed by the hotel keepers, for single mare or gelding in harness, best two in three heats. There were five entries. The race was well contested and was finally won by Clancey's little black mare, with John Johnston's chestnut a good second. W. F. Miles' pony took the third.

The prize for span trotting horses in harness attracted six entries. Mr. Fred Kaylor's fine team took the three heats, with Mr. John Johnston's 2nd and Mr. Thomas Empey's 3rd. The first heat of this race was a burlesque, nearly all the teams running over the course. It looked much like an old time chariot race. The other heats were, however, well trotted. The pacing race was a failure, there being only one entry, A. Schryver, and he was given the prize. This closed the races for the day.

In the evening the palace was thrown open for inspection and was visited by many townspeople.

Second Day.

The attendance on Tuesday was the largest ever on the grounds. In the afternoon there must have been at least eight thousand people inside the gates. The scene was very animated and the palace and grounds showed off to good advantage. Visitors from a distance pronounced it the best county show they ever attended.

The Outside Show.

The outside display of stock, machinery, etc., was never better. The first department reached on entering the grounds was that devoted to carriage work. The number of rigs was unprecedented and the quality of work surpassed anything ever shown here. The exhibitors were mainly from a distance.

CARRIAGES, ETC.

The Napanee exhibitors were Mr. N. German, who showed a fine top buggy; R. J. Wales, top phaeton, top buggy and wagon; Joy & Sons, 2 top carriages, 2 market wagons and a lumber wagon; Mr. Ash, a top buggy. The wagons of Joy and Wales were especially deserving of mention though they were not awarded the leading prizes.

Mr. Geo. W. Robinson, of Kingston, showed a handsome coupe, manufactured for Mr. A. Gunn, M. P., of Kingston, at a cost of $1000; a top phaeton, a village cart, a democrat wagon, a Portland cutter and a child's sleigh. The designs of the rigs were neat and novel while the workmanship was of the highest order. He also showed a pony cart to which were attached two teams of Shetland ponies. This was an attractive feature to the children, and during the afternoon when he distributed ten dollars worth of new coppers the boys more than scrambled for the lucre. His exhibit was most creditable.

Mr. Brown, of Kingston, also showed a number of fine rigs.

Messrs. Bertrim Bros. of Harrowsmith, showed a number of rigs which attracted much attention and admiration.

Mr. F. W. Adams, of Picton, was a most successful exhibitor. He showed a two-seated canopied top carriage and a top buggy, upon both of which he won first prizes. They were elegant rigs.

AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS.

In agricultural implements there was a large display, the largest and most varied of which was that of the Napanee Agricultural works, Mr. John Herring, proprietor. The implements included Herring's Harvest Queen Reaper which has been improved this year so that now the knives, rakes and table are all controlled by the driver from the seat. The machine is light, strongly constructed and works like a charm. It was well finished and attracted much attention. Alongside was a New Model Mower which has an improved gearing added this season. The next machine was a Cultivator and Quack Harrow combined. This very useful implement takes the place of two machines. There are two setts of teeth and it can be used as a cultivator or for cutting up quack land. It was pronounced by farmers to be just the thing that is wanted. A Meadow Lark Combined Reaper and Mower was also shown, but as it is well known to the farmers a description of it is unnecessary. Among the other machines shown were a Self-Dump Horse Rake, Corn Cultivator, Straw Cutter, Cider Press. They also show a fine line of ploughs, the two-mould-board gang plough especially attracting attracting attention. This plough has improvements which renders it the best gang in the market. The New Dominion Single Plough was also much admired. The entire display was most creditable to Messrs. Herring, They carried off 9 first prizes and 1 second prize.

Messrs. Birrel & Phalen made a fine exhibit of the celebrated Massey Manufacturing Co.'s machines. It comprised a reaper, single mower, horse rake, seed drill, plows, cultivator, fanning mill and Birrell's hay and grain unloader. These machines are so widely known and approved that it would be superfluous to give them more praise. The unloader especially attracted the attention of farmers to whom it commended itself.

The Mann Manufacturing Co., of Brockville, were represented on the grounds by Mr. Mann himself. He showed the New Champion Hay Rake, which has a number of valuable improvemants, and a Combined Seeder and Harrow. The latter was in operation and was a subject of interest to the farmers.

Mr. J. N. McKim, Napanee, showed the Triumph Reaper, manufactured at Grimsby, Ont. The following from the Syracuse, N. Y. Standard shows what the Triumph [illegible] prize-winners here. Dawson & Sons, of Ernesttown, were also large exhibitors. The Messrs. Gordons and Dawsons are well known as leading breeders of sheep in this section of the province and their flocks are difficult to be excelled. Mr. S. K. Miller showed a couple of pens of Shropshires, to which breed he is giving much attention, and is establishing a high reputation as a breeder. Mr. R. N. Switzer, Switzerville, showed Cotswolds and Leicesters, and Messrs. Samson & Sons, of Tyendinaga, showed Oxford Downs, and both made most creditable exhibits.

The space devoted to swine was well occupied, Suffolks being in the majority. There were, however, several good Berkshires shown.

—The show of poultry was very fine. Mr. Martin, of Tyendinaga, was the leading exhibitor and carried off the lion's share of the prizes. Messrs. Webster & Boyes also showed some very fine birds and got their full share of red tickets.

INSIDE THE BUILDING

was a grand display. Here, as is always the case with the people of Lennox, our representatives of the fair sex and our enterprising agriculturists, manufacturers and merchants, vied with each other in exhibiting the results of their many hours of tedious work with the needle, the crayon and the wheel, days of hard toil in the boiling sun, weeks of planning and work in the shop and months of study in the markets of the world and fashions of the worldly. The displays in this portion of the exhibition were creditable alike to the exhibitors and those entrusted with the management of the fair, and the thousands of visitors who thronged through the building felt well repaid for the time and trouble expended in traveling miles to witness the specimens there on view of the bountiful goodness of nature and the skill and handiwork of their fellow-creatures.

To the right, on entering, Messrs. Gibbard & Son showed several very fine suits of furniture, finished in the latest and most magnificent styles and arranged in a tasty and thoughtful manner.

Passing around, we viewed with interest vegetables, roots and grains of excellent quality; some specimens of "Beauty of Hebron" potatoes and of cabbage and mangold wurtzel being ot unusual size. Next in order comes the display of Thomas' organs, by Mr. W. D. Madden, six beautiful instruments being shown, including a fine pipe-top Cherub of superior finish and tone, a new Favorite, Garnett, two Rubies and a Grand Harmonica, ranging in value from $100 to $200. Messrs. Boyle & Son exhibited an assortment of cook stoves, ranges and hall and parlor stoves which fully merited the attention bestowed on them. Mr. H. W. Perry had on exhibition a display of hinges, axes plow coulters, augers, horse-shoes, bells, etc., all shown to good advantage. The apple exhibit of Mr. Fred Memberry, of Adolphustown, was a tempting sight, even to those who boasted of their self-command in the infinite credit. They have built several others during the past summer, all of which met with a ready sale.

The display consisted of two elegant bedroom suits in walnut, marble topped, French burl veneered panels and British plate mirrors; two parlors suits, one in ebony and gilt lined, upholstered with raw silk and terra cotta, and the other in walnut upholstered with crimson silk plush and peacock blue bands; two side boards in walnut, one with marble top and the other embellished with French burl panels; an elegant hall rack in walnut, marble top; and a collection of easy chairs beautifully upholstered. A striking feature of the display was a rich mantle in ebony and gold with British bevelled plate mirrors. It was recommended for a special prize The work was only a fair sample of the furniture turned out every day from the factory. For design, quality and prices they cannot be surpassed by any factory in the province.

Mr. J. N. McKim, Napanee, showed the Triumph Reaper, manufactured at Grimsby, Ont. The following from the Syracuse, N. Y., Standard, shows what the Triumph can do:—At a trial of reapers on the farm of L. R. Gaylord, Lafayette, N. Y., the Triumph No. 2 came out victorious, competing with the Johnston, Osborne No. 8, Royce, Rawson, Champion and Buckeye. After seeing them work in wheat and badly lodged rye, the judges, Willis Alexander, J. H. Northway and Levi Mayhew, decided in favor of the Triumph No 2, which Mr. Gaylord purchased."

MARBLE WORK.

Mr. V. Kouber showed a "Cottage" style of a monument, made of Aberdeen grey granite; it is a new model and the workmanship is excellent. This was imported to order, for Mr. Jacob Alcombrack, of Hamburgh. Mr. Kouber is the only importer, from this section of these celebrated Scotch granites. By producing nothing but the very best work and material, his trade has increased to a considerable extent within a few years, in these as well as in adjoining counties. Call on him before you purchase, West Dundas Street, Napanee.

STOCK.

The show of cattle was not large but it included a number of fine animals. Messrs. Percy, Switzer and Neville, of Switzerville, showed a fine lot of thoroughbred Durhams. These gentlemen have done much by their enterprise to improve the stock in this vicinity and should be well supported. Mr. Adam Forshee showed a fine Durham bull. The Rathbun herd of Jerseys was not exhibited this year, but five fine young animals of this popular breed were shown by Mr. G. M. Beeman, of Napanee.

In horses there was a large show, especially of roadsters. Mr. Fred. Kaylor showed a fine team which carried off the red ticket. Close in the order of merit came the team of Mr. John Johnston, of Ernesttown. Mr. John Blanchard's fine carriage team was also much admired and carried off the prize in that class. In single roadsters, Mr. D. C. Clancey and Mr. M. Shannon, of Camden, showed fine animals. For saddle-horses, Mr. R. N. Switzer took the red ticket, with Mr. S. Madden a good second. The special prizes offered for "War Cry" colts brought into the lists several fine young animals which show this popular stallion to be an excellent stock getter. One of the colts gives promsse of being a duplicate of his sire in appearance as well as action. The "Glenelg" colts also showed up well. In the farm and general purpose class the Percheron stallions owned by Baker & Buchman carried off the honors, with Potter & Williams "Prince Royal" a good third. Mr. J. M. Lapum, of Wilton, showed a fine span of general purpose horses, and F. Vanslyck, of Morven, S. K. Miller and T. D. Creighton, spans of draughts. The show of horses was on the whole most creditable to the county.

Mr. John Carson, of Kingston, showed his fine imported Suffolk Punch stallion which was a centre of attraction. This animal was raised on the late Prince Leopold's estate and is one of the finest animals of his class living. Mr. Carson deserves great credit for his enterprise in introducing such a fine beast into this section. He was awarded a special prize.

In sheep there was a large display and the quality was up to the standard. Mr. F. Vandebogart, the pioneer breeder of sheep in the county, showed three pens of Southdowns, though no attempt was made to dress them up for show purposes. Messrs. William Gordon & Sons, of Odessa, showed four pens of fine Cotswolds and Southdowns. They took thirteen prizes and a diploma at the Kingston Central, and were also all shown to good advantage. The apple exhibit of Mr. Fred Memberry, of Adolphustown, was a tempting sight, even to those who boasted of their self-command in the matter of senses, while to the small boy the spectacle of so much luscious fruit was enough to cause a repetition of the crime alluded to in Genesis. Mr. Membery fully merited the red ticket awarded him, as the staff of THE EXPRESS can fully attest. Mr. R. Vance had a very good showing of fancy goods and a considerable crowd surrounded his stand almost constantly, while a spectacle vendor and a Yankee inventor of a patent needle threader held forth close by.

At the foot of the stairs leading to the upper floor was the irrepressible and cosmopolitan pea-nut vendor, at whose hands hundreds received the oily kernal and the dry and brittle shell—the one to derange the gastric juices of the stomach and the other to litter the floor. But the people were happy and delighted with the sights which met their gaze and with the luxury with which they treated their palates, and the pea-nut man reaped a harvest, therefore no one was left to criticise to the disadvantage of either. Reaching the top of the stairway we look around and view the fine assortment of clothing, hats, caps, and all manner of gents' furnishings belonging to Mr. J. F. McAlister. Skill in manufacture, shrewdness in purchase and taste in arrangement enabled him to make a very attractive showing and to carry off the prize for general desplay. Perry & Co.'s perfumery, toilet soaps, cigars, patent medicines and velvet portrait frames were also worthy of inspection. But the grandest desplay in the building was that of Messrs. Hinch, Perry & Co. in furs. The floor and the space occupied by them was covered with Brussels carpets, while the ceiling was hid from view by a tasty arrangement of raw silk. The exhibit consisted of furs made up into coats, mantles, caps, etc. A silk lined bokharen mantle of exceeding fine finish was much admired as were also some Persian Lamb coats and caps, and Japanese wolf and bear robes. Conspicuous among the display were a stuffed badger, brought from the North-West, and a wild-cat. Next in order were blankets, carpets, tweeds and full-cloths of good quality. Then came the exhibits of sewing machines and an organette by Mr. J. N. Mc Creary. A. Rose & Co. showed a grand assortment of ladies' and gents' fine boots and shoes, and the general opinion was that an injustice was done him in not getting first first prize.

The ladies' work was up to its usual standard. There were there in magnificent profusion, sofa pillows, pillow shams, quilts, crocheting, and all kinds of needle-work, knitting, etc., and fine specimens of pencil and crayon drawings and oil paintings, as well as wax work of superior execution. A case of wood carving drew considerable attentions as also did some fine wall brackets.

Notes.

—Mr. H.W. Perry, of the Golden Augur, showed a white Angora and a black Russian goat.

—The ladies of the Presbyterian church served meals in the refreshment booth during the day, and realized $136 by their exertions.

—The 45th Battalion Band was in attendance Tuesday afternoon, and rendered a choice musical programme.

—K. J Strong & Co., made a fine large display of single and double harness and other articles in their line and secured several prizes.

—An elegant hearse, manufactured by Mr. Ezra Pringle and Mr. W. T. Gibbard attracted much attention. The gearing and frame was made by Mr. Pringle and the finishing and upholstering was the work of Mr. Gibbard. Between the two of them they produced a hearse which does them

AGRICULTURAL.

The practice of cutting top-stalks is a wasteful one, wasting good fodder and valuable time, and should be abandoned by every one who calls himself a farmer. Grain does not ripen any better standing on the butt stalk than it does in the stock if cut at the right time and put up properly.

Keep the sheep well fed now. It will soon be time to couple them, if early lambs are wanted for market next spring. A little extra feed at this season is all important for this purpose. And those which are not to be kept over winter should begin to fatten now, and they may be ready for the butcher in December.

The earliest buckwheat is rarely well filled unless a succession of cool days and nights come as the grain is forming. The latest date which will ripen the grain before frost will give the best crops. Salt is a good application for buckwheat from the property which salt has in making the soil moist and cool.

If strawberries have been kept reasonably clean until the crop has been gathered, the bed may be preserved another season by plowing two furrows togethee between each row, leaving the ridge onr or two weeks until the living plants are destroyed, and then levelling down with a one-horse cultivator. The spaces in the rows should then be thinned by removing the poorest plants and all weeds, and the whole kept clean until another season.

Continue the potato digging as fast as they ripen. They are better out of the ground than in it. Do not leave them too long exposed to the sun. Many a boy has good reason to be thankful that the introductien of new and earlier varieties, and the practice of earlier planting to avoid the beetles, has so modified the cultivation of the potato that the digging of them no longer need be left until after frost comes, for it was sometimes cold work pulling the vines and picking up the late potatoes.

Some kinds of land are so full of water most of the year that underdraining is only possible after the summer has dried out the soil. But on ordinary fields, not excessively wet, the soil is now too hard to underdrain properly, unless machinery is used which works better when the ground is firm for horses to work on. Drains dug in the fall will, however, do better service next season than those delayed till next spring. The frost in winter deepens the soil and makes water courses through which the drains are reached.

It is not profitable to plant many sweet apples, though good as baking apples, though every farmer should grow enough for a home supply. When we go into the market, however, not one bushel in fifty is wanted of the varieties of sweet apples. Most people seem to have an idea that tart apples to make pies, with sugar to sweeten, are the only kinds it will pay to purchase. At this season the Golden Sweet is one of the very best apples either eaten out of the hand or baked. No seasoning is needed to make them delicious.

Before the days of ice creameries and refrigerators our grandmothers learned the advantages of setting milk in deep cans in wells. They got more and better cream by this method, but there were some disadvantages connected with it. The milk would occasionally be spilled and this soured the water and made it unfit to drink. The cream was disturbed in bringing it up, and altogether it is much better to use the modern creamery, taking cold water from the well if ice cannot be had, and changing the water once after it has absorbed the heat from the new milk.

Persons who are not practical farmers are unanimous in advising that the aftermath be allowed to grow as large as possible as a protection against freezing out in winter. There is something to be said on both sides of this question. On very rich land the aftermath will grow so thickly as to injure the roots, especially if heavy snow falls. It forms a harbor for mice and in the spring the grass has to make its way through this dense mass as best it can. It is probably better to let the aftermath grow for a while after mowing and then cut or pasture later in the season.

The Farmers' Home Journal says that it takes weeks and months and almost endless correspondence to get an animal recorded in the American Short-Horn Herd Book, and that "the way in which the correspondence of the Secretary's office has been neglected is causing the greatest complaint." The Secretary is not responsible for any delays that may occur in the work of the editors, and the correspondence in his office is cleared away each day. If the editors spend their time in writing "endless correspondence" they probably do it because they have no time for a vacation and must have a little fun.

Colman's Rural World of St Louis says the sale of Aberdeen-Angus and Galloway cattle by Leonard Bros. of Missouri, at Cheyenne, was not a success. "No doubt was entertained of the excellence of the bulls, but it was rainy weather, and in fact rather late in the season to sell such stock. Only four head out of thirty were sold, at an average of $300 apiece, all to J. T. Limberg of Leadville. That is just what the animals cost in Scotland. There was much to contend against in Cheyenne for anybody handling the Polled Angus or Galloway, as the general sentiment among the cattlemen of that section favors the Herefords, the Short-Horns coming next."

The Cabbage Worm.

Every gardener knows from experience that great loss to the crop is caused every year by the green cabbage worm which feeds greedily upon the heads of the growing cabbages. The most effective remedy yet discovery for this destructive pest is Persian insect powder, or pyrethrum. This can be obtained at the druggists and should be thoroughly mixed with twenty times its bulk of flour and sprinkled well over the heads and leaves of all the growing plants. Another excellent remedy is a solution of saltpetre in water; a tablespoonful of the former to four quarts of water will be found plenty strong enough. Sprinkle the cabbage heads freely and the worms will loose their appetite for them. It is inexpensive and can be applied often.

Saltpetre water is probably one of the best antidotes for the rose bug and current worm that has yet been discovered. Apply to grape vines and current bushes with a force pump or garden syringe. It is said that grape rot can be prevented by syringing the fruit with a carbolic acid water made by mixing one ounce of carbolic acid with three gallons of water.

Saving Clover Seed.

A new enemy has appeared which destroys the clover seed. It is a weevil or beetle which bores into the seed pods and eats out the interior of the seed, leaving only empty shells. Ii a head of ripe clover is examined closely, it will be found to consist of a number of pods very much like those of peas or beans and the seeds are contained in these pods. It is thus related to the pea and bean family, and classed in the great botanical family of the Luguminosæ. Curiously, this family is pestered with a peculiar insect—a small beetle which punctures the pods and lays its eggs in them. The young larvæ, when hatched, bore into the seeds, and are the very common weevils which we find in peas and beans. And now a weevil has appeared which injures clover seed in the same way. By sowing infested seed, this pest is of course sown with it and propagated in the most favourable manner for its increase and spread. This fact is of interest to those farmers who buy clover seed, because this insect is quite preralent in localities where clover seed is grown as a crop, and so much so in parts of the western States as to injure very much the business of making and selling clover butters. Every farmer, then, should save his own seed who can do it. Morever, he should examine the seed by rubbing it in his hands and testing its solidity and weight. If it is infested with the weevil it should be destroyed by burning it. If not, it should be harvested and saved with care, so as to avoid the risk of using infested seed.

Clover is cut for seed in September, when the seed heads are ripe and brown. As the stems are necessarily hard and woody, and the leaves dry and withered, the crop is useless for feeding, but is valuable for litter after the seed is thrashed out. For home use it is necessary to hull the seed or separate it from the chaff, as it may be sown with the chaff, just as well as if cleaned, and the seed may be more liberally used. The clover is left on the ground until it is thoroughly dry, and a few wettings and drying are a help to the easy thrashing of the seed, as they tend to loosen the tough pods and cause them to become brittle. When it is thoroughly dry the clover should be stored where it can be reached in the winter, and then thrashed out on a cold, sharp, dry day. Mice are very destructive to the thrashed clover, and it is best, therefore, to bag it and store it out of their reach.

The Use of Lime.

It is a sort of axiom among farmers that "where limes are used the land and the farmers are rich." This is an old but true adage and deserves to be made one of the established axioms of agriculture

A MARVELOUS STORY

TOLD IN TWO LETTERS.

FROM THE SON: "28 Cedar St., New York, Oct. 28, 1882.

"Gentlemen: My father resides at Glover, Vt. He has been a great sufferer from Scrofula, and the inclosed letter will tell you what a marvelous effect has had in his case. I think his blood must have contained the humor for at least ten years; but it did not show, except in the form of a scrofulous sore on the wrist, until about five years ago. From a few spots which appeared at that time, it gradually spread so as to cover his entire body. I assure you he was terribly afflicted, and an object of pity, when he began using your medicine. Now, there are few men of his age who enjoy as good health as he has. I could easily name fifty persons who would testify to the facts in his case.

Yours truly, W. M. PHILLIPS."

FROM THE FATHER: "It is both a pleasure and a duty for me to state to you the benefit I have derived from the use of

Ayer's Sarsaparilla.

Six months ago I was completely covered with a terrible humor and scrofulous sores. The humor caused an incessant and intolerable itching, and the skin cracked so as to cause the blood to flow in many places whenever I moved. My sufferings were great, and my life a burden. I commenced the use of the SARSAPARILLA in April last, and have used it regularly since that time. My condition began to improve at once. The sores have all healed, and I feel perfectly well in every respect—being now able to do a good day's work, although 73 years of age. Many inquire what has wrought such a cure in my case, and I tell them, as I have here tried to tell you, AYER'S SARSAPARILLA. Glover, Vt., Oct. 21, 1882. Yours gratefully,

HIRAM PHILLIPS."

AYER'S SARSAPARILLA cures Scrofula and all Scrofulous Complaints, Erysipelas, Eczema, Ringworm, Blotches, Sores, Boils, Tumors, and Eruptions of the Skin. It clears the blood of all impurities, aids digestion, stimulates the action of the bowels, and thus restores vitality and strengthens the whole system.

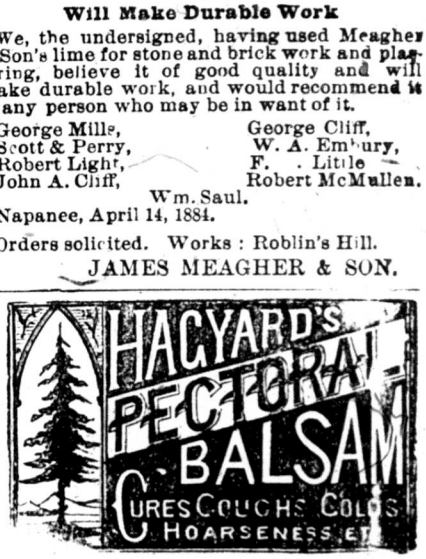
JAMES MEAGHER & SON.



the farmers are rich." This is an old but true adage and deserves to be made one of the established axioms of agriculture. It is true in two ways—one, that lime is an exceedingly valuable fertilizing agent of itself, and in addition exerts a most beneficial influence upon the soil as a solvent of the silicates, chiefly of potash, and also in decomposing organic matter in the soil and favoring its nitrification and the production of the indispensable nitrification and the production of the indispensible nitrates which so greatly enrich the soil, the other that its use is one of those higher attributes of skillful farming which is consistent only with the best culture of the soil and the most thorough and systematic working of it. It is, in fact, in the farmer's hands, one of those instruments which is rarely or never found excepting where every part of the farm work is done in the most excellent manner, so that it is not so much that the farmer uses lime as that he uses it as a part of a system of farming which is thoroughly excellent, and, of course, very profitable. Lime is thus not to be used in a haphazard way, and simply to extract from the soil the last vestiges of fertility it can bring out. When thus used another common adage, that "lime enriches the father and impoverishes the son," will surely be found true, because it is like a last turn of the screw which squeezes the last drop of juice from the cider mill.

The place of lime in good farming is its application to the land at the fall season when rye or wheat is sown and grass or clover seeding follows. The land has then become more or less supplied with organic matter from the roots and waste of previous crops, and it has accumulated a store of nitrogenous and carbonaceous matter which cannot be made available until it is decomposed nor until a sufficient quantity of mineral matter has been set free in the soil to balance the supply of plant food required for a new rotation of crops. Besides at this season and with fall grain the regular manuring of the land is given, and the manure is generally coarse and undecomposed. It is precisely under such conditions that lime is of the greatest use and value and fits the soil for a new round of crops.

The quantity of lime usually applied is forty to fifty bushels per acre of freshly burned or stone lime. In the air-slacking by which it is prepared for use it swells to three times its original bulk and becomes a fine powder which is spread from a waggon, with a long-handled shovel, evenly over the soil. This should be done upon the plowed land immediately before sowing, when it is harrowed in previously. As lime is quite soluble in this fine condition, requiring only 700 times its own bulk of water to dissolve it, it should never be plowed in, or it will be very quickly carried down into the soil, below the reach of the roots of any plants, excepting those of clover. Clover is one of the plants which are wonderfully benefited by lime, and it is for this reason among many others, that its use is to be encouraged, because it provides the skillful farmer with one of the most valuable sources of manure, viz., a heavy clover sod to be plowed in.

Sober thought about one's own sober soul and its destiny is by no means a favorite occupation with men.

CANNIBALISM IN ARCTIC SEA.

Belief that it was Practised by Franklin's Men.

Letter from Dr. J. Rae to the Editor of the London Standard.

In a leader in the Standard on the horrible disclosures regarding the recent Greeley expedition, the writer expresses a hope and belief that these charges may be found as baseless as similar ones made regarding the unfortunate Franklin expedition. It is not my wish to rake up a very sad story, but I would (being a party concerned) take it as a great kindness if the writer of your leader, or any one else could inform me what proofs there were that the story about cannibalism among the Franklin party was "baseless." I read carefully everything written on this subject, from Dickens downward, and found little to justify your statement. True, there was a quantity of scurrilous abuse of a people of whom the writers knew nothing, the Esquimaux, whom that great and honest and distinguished man Parry called, after two year's experience, the most honest and truthful people he had ever met, agreeing in this with my own experience, comparing most favorably with the lying, deceit, and dishonesty spread broadcast among all classes in civilized life, very, very few of whom I could trust as I would the so-called savage Esquimaux. Had you, Sir, or any other honest and intelligent man heard, as I did, the story of my friends the Esquimaux about the dead of the Franklin expedition, communicated through my very efficient interpreter, the conviction would have been forced upon you that they spoke the truth. Even my man, John Beads, left in charge at Winter quarters, and informed by natives who had visited him by signs (Beads know not the Esquimaux language) of what had taken place.

Your leader says that discipline would have prevented men having resource to cannibalism. I do not believe any discipline would eradicate the cravings of nature, and it is all very well for those who, probably, have never been twenty-four hours continuously without food in their life to enlarge most indignantly on the subject. Had they been for days, as I have, living, or, rather existing, on the smallest scraps of skin and bones, and enjoying the most disgusting-looking food as if it had been the greatett delicacy, had they but witnessed the sufferings and cravings of some of my fine fellows during these times of privation, they would have had some knowledge of whrt starvation meant. Thank God! I myself was in a great measure free from very painful sensations of hunger, and could shoot as coolly at any game that came in the way as when I was on full allowance. * * * I feel bound to tell all I heard, however unpleasant and unacceptable it might be. A distinguished naval officer who followed up and found correct in almost every particular the information I obtained, even to the saddest part, was more politic—or more mean. Schwatka, the American, heard the same story that had been told to me, in almost the same words. A well-known Admiral once said of me that "Rae would tell the truth even to his injury." This to the Admiral referred to seemed something unusual.

What Arctic Exploration has Accomplished

From an "Open Letter," entitled "Is Arctic Exploration Worth Its Cost?" by J. E. Nourse, in the October Century, we quote the following:

"A true estimate of what Arctic exploration has gained will, in part, be reached by a comparison of the knowledge of our own continent half a century ago with that shown upon the school boy's map of to-day. The maps of 1825 exhibited for our northern coast line Baffin's Bay only on the east, and westward, dots only for the mouths of the Mackenzie and Hearne Rivers, up to the icy Cape of Cook, and theBehring Sea,—all which was then known except the new sweep of Parry's voyage in the far north. The charts of to-day accurately delineate the zone of land and the coast lines within the 60th and 130th degrees of west longitude, up to Cape Parry, latitude 71° 21', a region not largely frequented by the trader. To these add the explorations in the Eastern Hemisphere by the Russians, Danes, Austrians, Dutch and Swedes, crowned by the circumnavigation, first in the world's history, of northern Asia. And now Lockwood has extended the line of North Greenland.

"Again, no Arctic expedition has been fruitless of commercial and scientific gains. Cabot failed to find the passage, but he established the claims for our inheritance of English liberty and law. The first attempt to find the passage by the north-east, brought from the ill-fated Willoughby news like that from our De Long:

> "'He, with his hapless crew,
> Each full exerted at his several task,
> Froze into statues.

"But Willoughby's second ship made the discovery of Russia's wealth—'a new Indies'—for England, the beginning of maritime commerce on the north. Among the direct or indirect gains of this kind for us have been the whaling grounds of the north-east and the fisheries of Behring Strait, a region rendered safe by the voyage and charts of the Vincennes, the explorations of the Coast Survey, and latest by the Corwin and the Signal Service. Alaska is now attracting immigration; but its shores seemed forbidding in the extreme before the surveys of Rodgers and the trial observations of Dall and others were charted for the guidance of the mariner. The increasing returns to the Government and to the merchrnt from the fur, seal and the otter have shown the wisdom of the purchase.

"Still higher results are associated with the hydrogaphy of the great oceans; the observations needed for the further knowledge of the laws governing the origin and the course of storms, and magnetism, with its relation to the compass, the telegraph, and the telephone. 'We shall never accurately know,' says the President of our own Geographical Society, 'the laws of aerial and oceanic currents, unless we know more about what takes place in the Arctic Circle.'"

A Famous Gambler Dies in Poverty.

Emile Dupressoir, who in his time enjoyed a wide though questionable celebrity, died a few days ago at Baden-Baden. He was the successor of the famous M. Benazet as lessor of the gambling tables, converted the German watering place into a miniature Paris, and conducted everything in so magnificent a style as to gain for himself the brevet rank of "King of Baden-Baden." In 1871 Dupressoir made an offer to the French Government to pay the whole of the war indemnity demanded by Germany if he might be allowed to build on the site of the Ministry of Finance, which was destroyed during the Commune, a vast Alhambra and gambling house. In 1872, his term being at an end, he was compelled to discontinue his enterprize at Baden-Baden. He then attempted to obtain concessions for starting gambling houses at Fontarabia, on the Spanish frontier, and in the little republic of Andorre, but failed in both attempts. His next speculation was the establishment of the Cercle International at Paris, which, however, was not successful.

He embarked in various other luckless ventures that engulfed the whole of his vast fortunes. He died almost in poverty, the only possession left in his family being the Baden Court Hotel, which had been settled on his wife. Nothing succeeded with him. He was even compelled by ill-health to give up the management of the Casino of Monaco, which some time ago was intrusted to him. Gambling had taken so entire possession of his mind that he seemed not to be able to think of any other means whereby money could be made or a livelihood gained.—London Times.

Bears.

Not long since I was riding toward Cloud Peak, and had gone only three miles when I discovered two enormous grizzlies down in a horse-shoe canon. I left my pony, went to the canon wall, and opened fire on the enemies. The bears were five hundred yards away. My first shot wounded one of the monsters, and the wounded one immediately attacked the other bear. They fought desperately for fifteen minutes. It was a terrible encounter. The wounded bear was beaten by its antagonist, after which I shot the victor. They were both ferocious looking animals, and the two would weigh over three thousand pounds. Their tusks measured three inches, claws four inches, feet fourteen inches, and the bears were twelve feet long.

Leaving the two bears, I walked over a ridge not more than a mile away, and came on to four more, two black and two silver-tip bears. They did not see me, and my position was a good one, on the lee and near a nice smooth crag of granite. Slipping on a pair of moccasins, I was soon on top of the granite knob, 150 feet above ground. I opened fire immediately, only 200 yards, killed two at the first shot, and soon had them rolling down the mountain together.

It was an exciting time; the four bears made a terrible noise. After seeing a large eagle swoop down among the pines, catching a grouse, I descended from my rocky knob and ventured up to the bears. There they all lay in a heap, all dead and said of me that I'd would tell the truth even to his injury." This to the Admiral referred to seemed something unusual, although it appears to me very simple and natural, In the case of the Franklin party's cannibalism, it was certainly the simplest and best thing that could be done, because the story would surely have come to light through my men, who knew as much as I did by conversing with the interpreter, and the very person who attacked me for telling the story would have been equally ready, and had a far better reason to be down upon me for withholding facts. I repeat that cannibalism took place as surely among some of the Greeley party as it did among some of Franklin's people, and it took place among the latter as surely as that I am sitting writing this communication at this present time.

A Dakota Girl.

A broad-shouldered compactly built young woman, with brown face and hard hands, sat in the Lake Shore depot last evening, waiting for the departure of a train for the East. She had just arrived in town from Dakota.

"We don't waste any time in foolishness out our way," she said to a young man who seemed to be acquainted with her. "There is no love making on my half section. It's nothing but No. 2 wheat from May to August. That's what we are out out there for. Now, I own and manage a farm of 320 acres, and this year I took out a crop of eighteen bushels to the acre and sold it, got the cash, put it in the bank, discharged all my men but one, who will look after things this winter, and I'm off for a little fun down East. Marriage?" said she, in response to some remark by her companion; "that's what all the good-for-nothing cranks of men that I see from ploughing time to harvest can talk about. What do I want to get married for? There are more than three hundred of us girls farmers in Dakota, and we will hold a convention some time. I never saw a man yet that I would have around. I intend to farm till I get money enough to live on comfortably, and then I'll see. I'm in the habit of doing about as I please. There was a nice young fellow in my neighborhood last July, who tried to be very gallant and wanted to help me whenever I did any work. If I chopped a little wood he wanted to do it. If I went after a pail of water he wanted to carry it. If I put a bag of grain on my shoulder he insisted on giving me a lift. He was a pretty nice boy, but he made me tired. One day I wanted the hay-rack on the waggon, and I took hold of one end and clapped it up on the wheel so quick that it made him dizzy.

"'Let me,' says he, but he only threw the whole thing down in trying to get the other end up. He didn't have the strength.

"Says I: 'Oh, go away. You don't eat enough No. 2 wheat.' Then I put the rack up in good style.

"We meet lots of such fellows out there. They are good enough I suppose, but when I want one I will send for him."

The lightsome countenance of a friend giveth such an inward decking to the house where it lodgeth, that proudest palaces have a cause to envy the gilding.

the color for Princes, but does not stand heat. The black brings good fortune, but fears rocky ground. The chestnut is the most active. If one tell you that he has seen a horse fly in the air, ask of what color it was; if he replies "Chestnut," believe him. In a combat against a chestnut you must have a chestnut. The bay is the hardiest and most sober. If one tells you that a horse has leaped to the bottom of a precipice without hurting himself, ask of what color he was, and if he replies "Bay," believe him. Ben Dyab, a renowned chief of the desert happening one day to be pursued by Saad-el-Zenaty, turned to his son and asked, "What horses are in the front of the enemy?" "White horse," replied the son. "It is well; let us make for the sunny side, and they will melt away like butter." Some time afterward Ben Dyab again turned to his son and said, "What horses are in the front of the enemy?" "Black horses," cried his son. "It is well; let us make for stoney ground, and we shall have nothing to fear; they are the negroes of Soudan, who cannot walk with bare feet upon the flints." He changed his course, and the black horses were speedily distanced. A third time Ben Dyab asked, "And now what horses are in the front of the enemy?" "Dark chestnuts and dark bays." "In that case," said Ben Dyrb, "strike out, my children, strike out, and give your horses the heel, for these might perchance overtake us had we not given barley to ours all the summer through."

Is Man Descended from Reptiles?

The British Association at Montreal was greatly moved a telegram crouched in these words: "Caldwell finds monotremes viviparous, mesoblastic ovum." That does not seem to outsiders to be an epoch-making message; but it is explained by the scientific to signify that Mr. Caldwell, a physiologist of adequate knowledge, has discovered that the lowest known mammal, the duck-billed platypus, lays eggs like a bird, though it subsequently suckles its young, and that the structure of the egg is analogous to that of reptiles. Consequently, a high probability arises that all mammals, including man, descend from reptiles, instead of from amphibia, as has recently been imagined; and the Darwinian physiologists are shunted on to a new line, and must study the pedigree of reptiles as the possible channels through which progressive life descended with a quite new interest. The discovery is of value, though it help little toward the ultimate question—the origin of life on the planet. The existence of progressive energy in the original germ is not the less wonderful because it was developed first through reptiles, instead of amphibia. How did it come there at all?

Woman was the original "side issue."

A nese Quarter in

The Chinese colony in Queen's Gate consists of two buildings of the bungalow type—the one of considerable size, containing the living-rooms, the other and smaller the kitchen and eating apartment. The dining-hall, if it may be so called, consists of a fairly large chamber, entered by glass-paneled doors, which permit plenty of light to penetrate. The kitchen adjoins, allowing food to be served fresh and hot from the pot. The dining-tables are all square, it being contrary to the Buddhist practice to eat off any other shaped table. The origin of this curious custom is the legend that the affairs of the world were originally under the joint responsibility of eight gods of equal power. These spirits used invariably to sit round a four-sided table, two abreast, and it becomes all good Celestials to imitate their gods. The principal articles of food, which are here served out in three separate meals during the day, are rice and pork, those being the comestibles for which John has the most weakness, and green vegetables. For quenching thirst the almost universal panacea is, of course, tea, which, a small quantity being made at a time, is drank without either milk or sugar. The only intoxicant at present provided at South Kensington is samshou wine, a distillation from a Chinese rice, somewhat pungent to the taste, and very intoxicating in its effects. The hours at which meals are served are: tea at 8, dinner at 12, and supper at 6.—London Globe.

Naked Slaves in Timbuctoo

This girl was being brought Morocco gate, on the road from the city of Morocco. She was nude, comely of face and figure, with large, dreamy, lovely eyes and streaming long black hair. Her color was of the Olivian type, which shows the red blood coursing in the veins. She was of medium height and aged about 16 years. Four old Arab "dealers," garbed in all the glitter and tinsel of the Orient, guarded this girl as if she were an amazon of strength and powess. One old Arab in a loud voice cried out her merits and nationality as they passed out in the centre of the town. Halting, the whole party were suddenly surrounded by intending buayers, both Christians and pagans. They came up to the crouching girl, pulled her arms two and fro, opened her mouth and looked at her teeth, made her stand erect and then haggled over the price. "She is worth $100," says the Arab dealer in one simultaneous cry, "but we will let her go for $90 if you take her now." Our dragoman translates and tells us how she will go to Egypt and fetch $200 at the first bid.—Cor. Baltimore Sun.

WORDS OF WISDOM.

Wrinkles disfigure women less than ill-nature.

In judging of others, a man often rereth; but in examining himself, he always laboreth fruitfully.

We may laugh or weep at the madness of mankind; we have no right whatever to vilify them.

No action will be considered as blameless unless the will was so, for by the will the act was dictated.

Doctrines are of use only as they are practised; men may go to perdition with their heads full of truth.

Be courageous and noble-minded; our own heart, and not other men's opinions of us, forms our true honor.

The living Christian—pure of heart and unspotted by the world—is the best preacher of the gospel in these days.

That state of life is the most happy where superfluities are not required and where necessaries are not wanting.

The years write their records on human hearts as they do on trees, in hidden inner circles of growth which no eye can see.

A loving act does more good than a fiery exhortation. What mankind needs is not more good talkers, but more good Samaritans.

The man whose soul is in his work finds his best reward in the work itself. The joy of achievement is vastly beyond the joy of reward.

The recollection of a deep and true affection is rather a divine nourishment for a soul to grow strong upon than a poison to destroy it.

He that does not know those things which are of use and necessity for him to know, is but an ignorant man, whatever he may know besides.

How abundant are the men and women who crave martyrdom in leadership! How few are willing to honour themselves in the loyalty of service!

This is the law of benefits between men; the one ought to forget at once what he has given, and the other ought never to forget what he has received.

He who is conscious of his ignorance, viewing it in the light of misfortune, is more wise than one who mistakes superficial polish for real knowledge.

Faith though weak, is still faith; a glimmering taper, is not a glowing torch; but the taper may give light as truly as the torch, though not so brightly.

Patience strengthens the spirit, sweettens temper, stifles anger, extinguishes envy, subdues pride, bridles the tongue, refrains the hand, and tramples upon temptations.

Falsehood is in a hurry; it may be at any moment detected and punished. Truth is calm, serene, its judgement is on high; its king cometh out of the chambers of eternity.

As the sun does not wait for prayers and incantations before he rises, but straightway shines forth and is hailed of all, so do not wait to do good for applause and noise and praise, but do it with your own desire, and, like the sun, you will be loved.

Riding an Alligator.

"I came in my journey," says a traveller, "to the banks of a river which was crossed by a ford. A train of pack-mules was passing, and while waiting my turn I went into the ferry-house to escape the heat of the morning sun. Several other gentlemen were there. Presently, an Indian came to the door, and addressing us in Spanish, asked 'Would the senors like to see me ride the alligator?'" "Handing around his hat, he received with satisfaction several gold pieces. He placed these in his money belt, and saying, 'I am ready,' led the way. He then drew out a sharp-pointed knife, and felt its edges as he walked along. The river lay before us, with deep black water on either side the shallow ford. The opposite bank was steep, and a Don at my side remarked that below the water's edge it was dug out in burrows, where the caymans (as they are called in those parts) were wont to lie in bad weather, tier above tier. Now they were out in full force, spread over the sand on our shore like scaly logs. Our Indian, a lithe, active fellow, ran lightly up to one of the beasts, and before the astonished animal could recover himself enough to sweep his tail around and dash him down, his enemy was upon his back, and had seated himself directly behind the fore legs, clasping the body, and holding the knife still in his hand. Rage and fury entered the beast's heart. He slipped into the deep water, and made for his particular place of refuge. Once there, woe to the rider! But the dominion given to man over all beasts did not fail now. With a prick of the knife in the creature, his rider defeated his purpose, and he plunged madly around the water basin. No rider was ever wilder, no circus rider more skilful, than the clinging Indian in the wild race that was now begun. Stirring the muddy depths, churning the waves with the greatest commotion, round and round they flew, ever faster and faster, now above, now below the surface. The Indian, cool and wary, by an occasional prod of the knife caused his strange steed to swerve from the dangerous points. Whichever direction he wished him to take, he pricked him on the opposite side. When it became evident to our circus rider that he had given us a fair display of his powers, we saw him watchfully and cautiously prepare to land. And this part of the exploit was the most wonderful of all. How to leap in mid-career from the furious creature—this was the task—and it was as admirably executed as any part of the performance. As they neared our shore the Indian, having gathered himself up, leaped lightly off, waded to short, and came towards us with as much of a smile on his countenance as any of his race ever show.

"Now downwards, swifter than if a thousand spurs were driving him, dived the great creature, to solace himself in the cold, sunless caverns of the river's depths."

Lettuce, says the Lancet, is a neglected vegetable, although it constitutes a prominent ingredient in every good salad. At one time the lettuce was supposed to possess soporific properties, but of late years it has, perhaps too hastily, been disestablished as a drug in the repertory of the therapeutist. Some are now strongly insisting that lettuce should be used more generally as food, and suggesting that the leaves ought to be boiled, after which treatment they are said to be as palatable as spinach. If this be the fact it is worth knowing, as spinach is necessarily excluded from the diet of the oxaluric patent and it is precisely in this class of cases the soothing properties of the lettuce, if it have any, would be valuable.

The history of the world teaches no lesson with more impressive solemnity than this; That the only safeguard to a great intellect is a pure heart; that evil no sooner takes possession of the heart, than folly commences the conquest of the mind.

Politeness is the religion of the heart as piety is that of the soul. It is good nature in action. It renders whoever may be its object contented and happy under its softening influence. It consists in acts which shows their source—the heart.

Strange Antipathies.

The following are a few of the more striking manifestations of that unaccountable feeling of antipathy to certain objects to which so many persons are subject, and with instances of which—in a modified form, perhaps—most people are acquainted.

Erasmus, though a native of Rotterdam, had such an aversion to fish that the smell of it threw him into a fever.

Ambrose Pare mentions a gentleman who could never see an eel without fainting.

There is an account of another gentleman who would fall into convulsions at the sight of a carp.

A lady, a native of France, always fainted on seeing boiled lobsters. Other persons from the same country experienced the same inconvenience from the smell of roses, though particularly partial to the odor of jonquils or tuberoses.

Joseph Scaliger and Peter Abono never could drink milk.

Cardan was particularly disgusted at the sight of eggs.

Uladislaus, King of Poland, could not bear to see apples.

If an apple was shown to Chesne, secretary to Francis I., he bled at the nose.

A gentleman in the court of Emperor Ferdinand would bleed at the nose on hearing the mewing of a cat, however great the distance might be from him.

Henry III., of France, could never sit in a room with a cat.

The Duke of Schomburg had the same aversion.

M. Vangheim, a great huntsman in Hanover, would faint, or, if he had sufficient time, would run away, at the sight of a roasted pig.

John Rol, a gentleman in Alcantara, would swoon on hearing the word lana, wool, although his cloak was woollen.

The philosophical Boyle could not conquer a strong aversion to the sound of water running through a pipe.

La Mothe le Vayer could not endure the sound of musical instruments, though he experienced a lively pleasure whenever it thundered.

Quite a Difference.

"What a conceited man Jenks is," observed Brown to Simpson.

"I never noticed it."

"I have. The other day he met me on the street and detained me half an hour telling me how he was once offered the position of Minister to Turkey. I never met such an egotistical man."

"That isn't egotism."

"What is it then?"

a sermon delivered last Sunday in that place by Audrew Jackson Potter, the fighting parson. Among other things he said: "I have preached out here on the frontier for the past 16 years, and I have lived and supported a large family. I must say, though, I got most of my support from the cowboys. Years ago, where the town of Uvalde now stands, I have skipped from thicket to thicket in my endeavors to escape from the leaden bullets that were flying around in order to reach a little old log school house where I could preach to a few women and children. Now, look at Uvalde to-day, with its five fine churches, whose spires point heavenward. I went to Fort Clark to preach several years ago. and started in without a church member, and at the end of 12 months I quit without a member. I thought that was the hardest place I had struck. One day, just after the boys had been paid off, I was walking up the street and noticed a lot of soldiers and gamblers collected in front of a saloon. As I was passing, one of them hollered: 'Hullo Parson!' I went across, and they asked me to preach, saying this was the biggest crowd I'd ever have an opportunity to talk to in Brackett. I said: 'Gentlemen, preaching is my business, but I always make it a rule before beginning to take up a collection Fifty cents is the regular donation.' Taking off my hat I started around. All that I presented the hat to threw in 50 cents until I came to a young gambler. He looked at the hat, shook his head, saying, 'Parson, I'd like to chip in, but I'm busted.' I got more money in that place than any I have been in. Holding services at a place one time I took up a collection for the support of missions. There was a poor old lady present who I noticed dropped a five-dollar gold piece in the hat. I knew she was very poor and not able to afford so much, and thought she had intended to throw in a quarter, but made a mistake. So next day I met her husband and said to him: 'Look here, your wife put a five dollar gold piece in the hat yesterday. I think she must have made a mistake.' 'No, no,' he replied, 'my wife didn't make no mistake. She don't fling often, but let me tell you, when she flings the flings.'"

The Lady and the Raven.

One of our literary celebrities, happening not long ago to visit a lady of his acquaintance, found her engaged in watching with great interest the freaks of a tame raven hopping about the room. "Come and see my purchase," she said. "I bought him yesterday." "In memory of Edgar Poe?" he asked. "No," she replied; "you'll never guess why," "I give it up." "Well, then, I was told that ravens live 300 years, so I thought I would buy one just to satisfy myself whether they did or not."

death of the attitudes of life, and of the facial expression, does not depend upon the sudden appearance of what is called cadaveric or post-mortem rigidity, but upon the production of a vital act of rigidity or tonic contraction, like the fixed spasm that we often aee in hysterical or paralytic persons. 2. A number of causes of death, acting without the ordinary agony, may produce that strange phenomenon which is characterized by a persistence after death of the attitude and facial expression that existed at the moment of the last sigh.

To obtain aluminum, the Chemiker Zeitung says, ferrosilicium is mixed with fluoride of aluminum in equal proportions, and the mixture brought to a fusing heat. The materials decompose each other, and volatile fluosilicium is produced, with iron and aluminum alloyed together. To extract the vnluable aluminum a copper alloy is formed by melting the iron alloy with metallic copper and by reason of the greater affinity of the copper for aluminum this is attained, leaving only a slight residue of aluminum with the iron. When the fused mass is cold, copper bronze and iron have so settled that both bodies can be easily separated. Instead of the pure fluoride of aluminum the chloride may be used when chlorsilicum and iron aluminum alloy will be formed.

A Clever Commander.

Some amusing details are gradually coming to light in regard to the recent revolt of the female convicts in the prison of Alcala, in Spain. They drove out all the guards and took complete possession of the place, which they barricaded and guarded day and night. They had an ample supply of provisions, and when the troops arrived to capture the prison the women jeered them through the windows and pelted them with bread and vegetables from their abundant supply. The officer in charge of the expedition against these viragoes found himself in a bad fix. For eight days he did not know what to do. To use artillery against the young ladies was out of the question, and to get into the prison without smashing down the walls seemed impossible.

Every day telegrams from Madrid were poured upon the unfortunate old commander, giving him instructions. But all these instructions were far easier to give than to execute. At last he conceived a brilliant idea. He gathered together a band of the best looking soldiers in his command, made them shave, wax their moustaches, and put on their gayest uniforms. Then he sent them with a flag of truce to the Amazons. The handsome fellows were at once admitted, but were not allowed to return; in fact, they did not want them to get back, and it was part of the commander's plan of campaign to have them captured. In a very short time these military prisoners spread disunion and mutiny among the Amazons and then the place was easily taken

NAPANEE, FRIDAY, OCT. 10, 1884.

WHY SIR JOHN HAS GONE TO ENGLAND.

The sensation of the week has been the mysterious departure of Sir John Macdonald on Tuesday last for England. None of his friends seemed to know beforehand of his intention nor the object of his going, and he himself when interviewed by a Montreal reporter could give no better reason than that he wanted a little sea air and rest. Sir John may induce people in other parts of the Dominion to believe the trip is for health and semi-official business, but he cannot by any such pretences lead astray the people of Lennox who know the ins and outs of his campaign in this county in 1882.

The main object of Sir John Macdonald's hasty departure—no matter what the other reasons may have been—was to avoid the subpœna which he knows has been taken out to secure his evidence in the cross-petition against Mr. M. W. Pruyn, to be tried here on the 11th of next month. He well knows that his relations with Mr. Pruyn in that campaign will be investigated, and to thwart the exposure that might result he has resorted to his favorite old trick of keeping out of the way. This trick worked well for him in his celebrated trial in Kingston, when all that saved him from disqualification was the securing of Sir Alexander Campbell's withdrawal from the country until after the trial. Sir Alexander saved him them; probably Sir John now thinks that his "withdrawal" will save Mr. Pruyn. But that remains to be seen.

What have the people who have been yelling themselves hoarse about Mr. Hawley's absence got to say now? If it was a great sin in Mr. Hawley to go away four few days on a visit to some friends

BURNING OF THE WINDSOR HOTEL KINGSTON.

Many Narrow Escapes—A Costly Conflagration.

Shortly before three Monday morning a fire broke out in the kitchen of the Windsor Hotel, a building situated in the rear of the main building. The flames spread rapidly, and but a short time elapsed before the back of the main building was on fire and the whole building filled with dense smoke. There was quite a large number of transient guests and boarders in the house. They were aroused as quickly as possible, and all escaped, but in most instances lost all their effects, some of them not even saving personal apparel. Those sleeping on the fourth floor had much difficulty in getting out. Geo. McMahon, of the G. N. W. Telegraph Company's office, jumped from a third story window and was severely hurt. The firemen were early on hand, and both steam engines were put into service, but the fire had much rapid headway and there was no hopes of saving the hotel. The firemen turned their attention to saving the adjoining property. By four o'clock the whole structure was in ruins. No furniture was saved.

When the fire commenced rain descended in torrents, and this kept the fire from spreading. Never in the history of Kingston were there so many miraculous escapes. The heroic conduct of Henry O'Brien, brother of the proprietor, and young Blanche Meyers require special mention. The former went to the assistance of Mary McManus, Kate Thomas and Mary Walker, and dragged them to a window on the fourth story, where they slept. They refused to go out, but Henry put his arm around the waist of each, and in turn placed them on the fire escape, and they reached the ground in safety. Blanche Meyers seized an ulster and made for the stairs. She met Thomas O'Brien on the landing almost suffocated, and put the ulster over him and brought him to the stairs, when he got out safely. Blanche then got on the bannisters and slid from landing to landing. Martin O'Brien, the proprietor's wife and two children escaped in their night-clothes, losing their way twice in the smoke. All the inmates lost everything. Rhoda Wagar, the cook, rushed through the flames and received such severe burns about the head, arms, hands and feet that she was sent to the hospital. Annie Woods received bad burns about the head while trying to escape Geo. McMahon, telegraph operator, while jumping from a window, got caught on the sill by his suspender, and he dangled in the air, struggling violently. He fell thirty-five feet, injuring himself in several places, but not fatally. A thief stole a pair of pants which he drew out of the window, containing $75. The following escaped in their night clothes:—Prof. McDonald, wife and two children; M. O'Brien, wife and two children; Thos. and Henry O'Brien, G. McMahon; J. H. Morton, Port Hope; W. H. Weston, Brantford; M. B. Parsons, Detroit; M. J. Dickson, Brockville; F. Hislap, medical student; Capt. E. B. Estes, Miss Clow, of Napanee, carried out insensible; M. A. Whting, H. W. Hinch, Binghampton; C. Barrett, millinery samples, carried out insensible; Z. Davis, Montreal; De La Hooke had a very narrow escape, losing his way in the hall; Frank Conway, H. Crothers, of Bath. All the guests and boarders lost their watches. Mr. O'Brien's loss is $12,000, insured for $5,000; B. M. Britton owned the building, insured for $10,500 and $3,600 on furniture; Geo. Sarsfield, boots and shoes, loss $2,000; insured for $1,000; J Franklin, flour dealer, loss $2,000; insured for $475. The Singer Sewing Machine office, Oddfellows' hall, School Board rooms and G. B. Wilkinson's store

Napanee, showed the Singer sewing machine.

The ladies' department, though containing many handsome articles, was not very well supported. The show, on the whole, was inferior, and the county should make an effort next year to redeem its reputation. Following is the yelling themselves hoarse about Mr. Hawley's absence got to say now? If it was a great sin in Mr. Hawley to go away for a few days on a visit to some friends while a writ was out against him in an election protest, when there was recourse to substitution of service, what have they to say of their adored leader running away on the eve of an election trial to avoid giving evidence? Will they defend such a proceeding? It is more than probable that they will. Nothing that Sir John Macdonald can now do will disgust them. They have become so accustomed to condoning outrages he has perpetrated against the state and the law that they can go to any extreme now.

It is not unlikely that an application will be made to have the trial postponed until the Premier's return, as with such an important witness out of the way full justice could not be done in the case.

OBITUARY.

The Late Rev. Nathan F. Perry.

Died, at St. Albans, N.Y., on Wednesday, 17th September, Rev. Nathan F. Perry, son of W. R. Perry, Esq., of Violet, after an illness of only ten days. The Rev. gentleman contracted a cold at a camp meeting which brought on congestion of the lungs and an attack of heart disease, to which latter disease he was subject. Appropriate services were held at St. Albans, after which his remains were removed to Ludlow, where he first labored, and interred in the cemetery there. The deceased was born at Violet on the 13th October, 1840, and was converted under the labors and preachings of the Rev. Father Taylor, in the school house at Violet. His father was anxious that he should become a land surveyor and consequently sent him to Victoria College, Cobourg, but this did not seem to be the bent of his mind. At a camp meeting held on the old Ebenezer Camp Meeting Ground, under the superintendency of the Rev. James Gray, he there decided to take the work of the ministry. The following summer he went to visit his sister then living in New York State. The presiding elder persuaded him to take work, and there he preached his first sermon. He then concluded to go to Boston Theological Seminary. In the vacation he was sent to a town called Ludlow to preach. The following summer the congregation at Ludlow petitioned the conference then assembled to send him there as their pastor, which request was granted. His labors were crowned and blessed by a gracious revival, and the erection of a large and beautiful church with his name inscribed in large letters on one of the front windows and a life-size portrait hanging near the pulpit. He afterwards labored for thirteen years for his Master, with great success. His last place of work was at St. Albans, N.Y.

A memorial service was held on Sunday, the 28th Sept., in the church at Violet when a very appropriate sermon was delivered by the Superintendent of the Wilton Circuit, Rev. George Robinson, from the words "For me to live is Christ, but to die is gain." A large number of relatives and acquaintances assembled to pay the last tribute of respect to one so dearly loved.

Rest and Comfort to the Suffering.

"Brown's Household Panacea" has no equal for relieving pain, both internal and external. It cures Pain in the Side, Back or Bowels, Sore Throat, Rheumatism, Toothache, Lumbago, and any kind of a Pain or Ache. "It will most assuredly quicken the Blood and Heal, as its active power is wonderful." "Brown's Household Panacea" being acknowledged as the great Pain Reliever, and of double the strength of any other Elixir or Liniment in the world, should be in every family handy for use when wanted, "as it really is the best remedy in the world for Cramps in the Stomach, and Pains and Aches of all kinds," and is for sale by all Druggists at 25 cents a bottle. 14-12-1y.

$1,000; J Franklin, flour dealer, loss $2,000; insured for $475. The Singer Sewing Machine office, Oddfellows' hall, School Board rooms and G. B. Wilkinson's store were also damaged. The origin of the fire is unknown, but it is believed to have been caused by leaking gas coming in contact with a kitchen stove.

ADDINGTON FALL SHOW.

Not up to the Standard of Former Years.

The weather of Saturday was not favorable to a large exhibit or to a large attendance at the Addington fall show, held at Newburgh. It rained in the morning, and during the day there were lowering clowds, with occasional showers. This, together with the rule adopted by the directors, excluding any persons except residents of the electoral division from exhibiting, rendered the show inferior to those of former years. The outside exhibits were, apart from the carriages and horses, very small. In cattle the only animals worthy of particular mention were three yoke of oxen, owned respectively by Messrs. McGill, Walker and Youmans, of Camden, and they were really first-class animals. There was a fair show of sheep, but not nearly as good as last year, when the Ernesttown breeders exhibited. They were mainly Leicesters and Southdowns. The exhibit of swine was small, only two or three pens being occupied. Several fine carriage horses, single and double, were shown and their movements in the ring were the most interesting feature of the day. The show of carriages was the finest we have ever seen at a county exhibition. Mr. Finkle, of Newburgh, showed fifteen rigs—comprising a 3-seated covered carriage, a 2-seated carriage, 1 open and top phaeton, 3 top buggies, 2 open buggies, 3 market wagons, a covered market wagon and two cutters. The design of each rig was elegant and the workmanship superior. The 3-seated covered carriage attracted particular attention and deserved all the praise bestowed on it. Mr. Finkle was a large prize-winner. The next largest display was made by Bertrim Bros., of Harrowsmith, who carried off the honors at the Kingston Central. They showed 2 top buggies, 1 open buggy, a covered phaeton, a 2-seated top carriage, a 2-seated market wagon and a lumber wagon. The workmanship and material were superior, while the painting was exceptionally good. They carried off several prizes. Messrs. Burdette & McKim, of Newburgh, were also exhibitors in this class—showing 3 top buggies and a 2-seated market wagon, all of a high order. Mr. Thos. Scott, of Newburgh, showed two cutters. In agricultural implements Messrs. Stickney & Co., were the sole exhibitors. They showed their well-known "Improved Victor" and "Victor" reapers. The former has the new feather head, and the driver from the seat controls the knives, lowering apparatus and rakes. Both machines are so well known that they reduire no "puffing." They also showed a New Model Mower and a Corn Cultivator. Messrs. Connolly & Son of Yarker, showed their celebrated plows, and of course carried off the honors.

The inside display was up to the average. In roots and vegetables there was a good showing, but fruits were not up to the standard. The two setts of harness—one in gold and rubber and the other in nickle—which took the prizes, were both manufactured by Mr. G. W. Goodwin, of Napanee, and were of a superior quality. A fine display of stoves was made by Mr. Miles Caton, of Newburgh, who sells all the leading makes, including Powell & Jones, Smith's Falls, Stewart Manufacturing Co., of Brockville, Mann & Co., of Kingston, Hunt & Smith, Belleville and McClary, of London. The Newburgh tannery made a fine display of leathers, and Mr. Mr. J. N. McCeary, of

An Ex-Alderman Tried It.

Ex-Alderman Taylor of Toronto tried Hagyard's Yellow Oil for rheumatism. It cured him after all other remedies had failed.

——"Why; what's the matter?"

Lady—(with face envelloped in roll of hot cloths)—"Oh! I'm crazy with that Neuralgia that continually troubles me."

——"Well, how foolish! Why don't you go to Grange's or Huffman's drug store, Napanee, or Aylsworth's drug store, Tamworth, and get a bottle of Fluid lightning? It cured me in less than one minute. I always keep a bottle in the house. It only costs 25cents.

—Costiveness is the cause of the intolerable "bad breath" of multitudes. Dr. Henry Baxter's Mandrake Bitters remove the cause and prevent the evil, and cost only 25 cents.

A Cure for Cholera Morbus.

A positive cure for this dangerous complaint, and for all acute or chronic forms of bowel complaint incident to summer and fall, is found in Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry; to be procured from any druggist.

—If you should be so unfortunate as to burn, scald or wound yourself in any way, the proper thing to keep clean and heal it is McGregor & Parke's Carbolic Cerate. Price 25 cents at Huffman's or Grange's drug store, Napanee, or Aylsworth's drug store, Tamworth. What they sell is genuine.

—The Methodist soiree and concert, last week, at Selby, was not very largely patronized, although the programme was full and of a most excellent character.

—We are glad to chronicle the improvement of Mrs. John McKim.

Shannonville.

[Correspondence of THE EXPRESS.]

FALL SHOW.—Our township show was held in Shannonville on Saturday last and was up to the average standard, and in many respects surpassed it. The morning opened clear and promising, but to the weather-wise there were certain indications of approaching rain and in the afternoon it came in teeming and abundant showers. The people had chiefly gathered before the rain came, so that it did not perceptably affect the attendance, but it marred the enjoyment of the day. There were 430 entries, quite an increase over last year, and many of the exhibits showed a spirit of amulation and enterprise, espeeially among the farming community. The young stock, both of horses and cattle were, specially good, and afforded evidence that special care had been given to the improvement of stock within the last few years. Much of the stock exhibited was so nearly equal in value that the labor of the judges had to be especially discriminate and onerous, but the result on the whole was generally satisfactory. When the chief purpose of such shows is to excite a spirit of healthy rivalry, it seemed a pity that in so many departments there was only a single exhibitor so that he had only to sweep the course. For example, it appears to an outsider, not specially creditable to the enterprise of Shannonville that all the prizes for harness-making and buggies should be carried off by Lonsdale. It was, I suppose, a foregone conclusion that Mr. Martin would scarcely have a successful rival in his fine exhibit of poultry, as in more imposing exhibitions he can scarcely be beat. It is said that at the late Central show, at Kingston, Mr. Martin carried off $49 as prizes for his magnificent show of poultry. Not so bad, that, for Tyendinaga. The day was not permitted to come to a close without some deplorable cases of brawling and drunkenness, in one case ending in a serious stabbing affray.

STABBING AFFRAY.—It appears that some young men unwisely provoked a Mohawk who was under the influence of liquor and he finally thrust out recklessly with a knife and stabbed one of them in several places, but nothing serious is likely to result from it, and very little sympathy is shown. It is

COMMERCIAL.

The Local Market.

The price for barley can now be said to be fixed. The Bay barley, which a few years ago had the highest reputation in the Oswego market, this season ranks as No. 2, while in Toronto it is classed No. 3. The sole cause of its depreciation is its colour. The price in Toronto is 52c on board cars and in Napanee from 50c. to 55c., but only the best samples bring the latter figure. Dealers complain that the Canadian market has been paralyzed by the Scott Act agitation. Brewers positively refuse to lay in stocks until they know the result of the contests now pending. There is no doubt that this has a depressing effect on the home market, but, of course, it does not effect the American markets. Canadian barley now, however, finds a strong competitor in Western barley, which this year is better in color and weight than usual. On the whole, the outlook for higer prices is bad. Deliveries are increasing and already some five or six cargoes have been shipped from this port. The hop market is also very dull. Medium lots in Toronto only bring from 16c. to 18c. though choice are held higher.

The market of Saturday was quite large notwithstanding the rain. All kinds of produce were in brisk demand. Following are the quotations up to date :—

but nothing serious is likely to result from it, and very little sympathy is shown. It is a pity that all bar-rooms are not shut by law on all fair days. Such scenes as were witnessed last Saturday on our streets would do more to hasten the enforcement of the Scott Act than a dozen temperance meetings.

CHURCH NOTES.—On Sabbath next the Hallelujah Band of Belleville, by special invitation, will hold their services in the Methodist church at Melrose. The Rev. James Curts, President of the Bay of Quinte conference, will preach on Sabbath next in the Spencer church, Thurlow, in the afternoon, and in Shannonville in the evening.

Newburgh.

[Correspondence of THE EXPRESS.]

—Our show was a very poor one, considering that it was a county show. I have seen better townships shows by far. It was worse than last year's and that was thought to be poor, I don't wonder at the fact. There are only 70 odd members this year while there were 130 last year. It has hurt the show not leaving it open to Ernesttown. People seem to be dissatisfied with the way it is conducted. They say there is no fair play shown. They have the same old judges every year and there are a few in Addington who rule the whole business, all for popularity or packet, I don't know which There are things in the place that are shown year after year and never taken away but left there till the next year. People don't like that. If a change is not made Newburgh county show will run out. They get as much from government as any other county $700. Of course Lennox gets share of that, but why don't they try to compete with Lennox? Newburgh years ago had the best show in the counties.

—That big law suit that was to come off in Belleville between H. Paul and C. Thompson is settled. Charley gives Henry the water by putting a pipe under the ground to carry it into his celler, and each pays his own costs.

—Miss Sweet was married to Mr. Colden of Belleville, on Saturday at the parsonage by the Rev. Mr. Briden.

—James Sutton is siding up and painting a large mansion on Front street.

—James Daly is selling out his stock on his farm in this village.

—Henry Dunn is doing a good business at blacksmithing. Hank takes the lead at horse-shoeing and repairs.

—We had a death in our village last week—a child belonging to Mr. Harry Care. The funeral was well attended to the English Church burying ground at Clarks Mills.

—Our Presbyterian minister, the Rev. Mr. Pollock, left for Scotland on the 2nd inst. We wish him a safe journey. It is not known who takes his place yet.

—The largest crowd of people that has ever gone on the train since the railway started, passed down on Tuesday for the county show at Napanee.

—No quorum of the Council Monday night.

—Two bloods from Newburgh went to the county show and got so excited that they started home with another man's horse. Johnny followed them and caught up with them and traded horses; and then they did'nt have their own horse, so they took the rig back next morning to hunt up the owner and get their own.

—We have two photographers in Newburgh. Mr. Marshall A. Jackson takes the lead.

—There is another wedding talked of.

—Newburgh station (Mr. Barber) sold on Tuesday eighty-three tickets, Clark's Mills (Mr. Johnston) seven-eight, Napanee Mills (Mr. Flynn) sixty-four.

GREAT SUCCESS

OUR SECOND GRAND OPENING!

AND DISPLAY OF FINE, RICH GOODS IN

Carpets, Millinery, Dress Goods, Furs,

MANTLE AND ULSTERING GOODS,

Silks, Cloths & Tweeds.

Was the most successful ever held at Cheapside, we had a larger crowd of visitors than ever before, and everyone expressed themselves delighted with the fine show of goods in every department. No where does the advice "what you don't see ask for" apply so forcibly as at our store its size does not permit us to show quantities of fine goods in every department, which are thus perforce hidden away from sight until called for. Our assortment is so large that we find it a great exception to be asked for any particular article not in stock. So well is this known that it is an axiom among the ladies that "what you can't find at Cheapside, no use looking elsewhere for."

OUR GRAND DISPLAY on Saturday convinced every person of the fact that there was no necessity of going outside of Napanee for the finest, richest, newest, most tasty goods, any person may require.

WE AIM TO DO WELL every branch of our large business and the very extensive and increasing patronage we enjoy, shows our efforts are not in vain. Our desire is to make CHEAPSIDE a household word throughout this and surrounding counties, and a store of which our citizens are proud. We think this in a great measure accomplished, as people visiting the town are not supposed to have done justice to its attractions without a visit to our store.

We have received congratulations on every side on the success of Saturday's opening, and the grand show of Carpets, Curtains and Furs, which we made at the County Show, and these exhibitions, visited by thousands of people, must convince every person that if they want anything in Furs, Carpets of any sort, Millinery, Mantles, Ulsters, fine Dress Goods, Silks, rich ornaments and Trimmings, fine Cloths and Tweeds, general Fancy Goods, as Gloves, Hosiery Corsets, Underclothing, etc, in fact anything they want to clothe themselves and families or to furnish their houses

Cheapside is the Best Place to Buy.

THE COLD SNAP WILL REMIND EVERYONE OF THE WANT OF FLANNELS, Blankets and Underclothing. We are just now showing a fine range of Men's Boys' and Ladies Underclothing in all sizes and prices.

We have just opened a large shipment of grey and white Blankets at lower prices than ever before seen in town.

We have just made a large purchase of Grey Flannels of the best make at unprecedentedly low prices, and will offer these goods lower than ever seen in Napanee before.

OUR MANUFACTURING BRANCHES are now in full swing and under the most competent management.

Our Dress and Mantle-making department is under the management of Mrs. Clapp, who has few equals and no superior.

Our Millinery deparment is under the management of Mrs. Doxsee.

Our Tailoring department is under the management of Mr. Max Fox, the champion cutter, who cuts and makes all our ladies heavy mantles, ulsters and tweed jackets, as well as men's clothing.

Of the above "array of talent" it may be said "they have no superior in their particular specialities," and we GUARANTEE all work from each of the departments perfectly satisfatory.

No doubt it was the short conversation he had held with Lloyd which brought to Stephen's mind so clearly and vividly that other meet at which Mrs. Rutledge had made her first appearance after her return home, and at which Sidney Arnold had been present, with a knot of violets at her breast and her handsome fiance by her side. As he rode into the field, he almost expected to see the well-appointed carriage, with its black horses and its beautiful occupant, to meet Frank Greville's mocking glance, to see the unfortunate Squire's angry face, to hear again Sidney's earnest voice—"I do trust you—I do trust you, Stephen"—and to see the pretty drooping figure as she rode away.

The meet was a full one. The weather was so essentially hunting weather that even the most languid sportsman had donned their pink. There had been a breakfast at Cotley Hall; and Lady Cotley, a handsome, middle-aged woman, as straight a rider and as ardent a votary of Nimrod as her lord himself, rode up to Stephen to reproach him for his wife's non-appearance.

"Why did you not bring your beautiful wife?" she said, in her loud cheerful voice. "I believe you are so jealously inclined that you would like to shut her up a la Bluebeard, and deprive us of the pleasure of looking at her. Headache! She has a headache, and you left her at home, when the very best remedy in the world would have been a good straight cross-country gallop! Miss Daunt, why do you let him act the mari jaloux, and why were you not here earlier?"

"We said we would come to the meet, Lady Cotley," Dolly answered, smiling.

"I told Lord de la Poer that you were coming to breakfast, and he has looked as angry as possible ever since. Ah, here he comes!" added her ladyship gaily, as she turned to greet some late comers; and Lord de la Poer came up, raising his hat to Dolly and glancing rather suspiciously at the face and figure of her cavalier, who returned the glance frankly enough, and yet with a quick jealous pang at his heart, for the Earl, leaving his title and rent-roll out of the question, looked as if he might be a dangerous rival.

Eighteen months of foreign travel had bronzed the handsome patrician face and given the tall slim figure a greater breadth of shoulder, so that Lord de la Poer was a decidedly handsome man; but his sojourn in foreign lands, which had so improved his appearance, had not entirely obliterated the impression Dolly Daunt had made upon him at the Hunt ball, at which she had made her debut, and when he returned home he was greatly pleased to find that she was still unwon. It was true Dolly was not quite in that circle from which the Earl should take his bride; but was not her mother an earl's daughter?

Since his return home Lord de la Poer's attentions had been as marked as his languid manner and natural indifference would allow them to be; and since Sidney's return from her wedding-tour, and Dolly had been her guest at Easthorpe, he had haunted her pretty drawing-room persistently, and had become, as Sidney and discussing the probabilities of a good run. But presently, as the hounds began to work, the horsemen forgot the excitement of their little flirtations for the greater one of the chase, and cantered about or took up positions which they considered most favorable.

Lord de la Poer was still in Dolly's immediate vicinity, looking somewhat sulky and annoyed, and casting occasional looks of sovereign displeasure at the young man whose hand still rested lightly on Dolly's bridle; but Miss Daunt, if she perceived his vexation, did not take the slightest heed of it. She sat, feeling pleasantly excited, and just sufficiently alarmed to make Lloyd Milner's protection delightful, and looking like a rose in June with her sweet rose-hued cheeks and smiling blue eyes.

At last a fox was found at the other end of the oover, and away galloped tho field, Lloyd Milner lingering for a moment by Dolly's side, reassuring her with a bright tender smile as he saw the anxious look she cast on him, satisfied himself that Lady Golightly would behave perfectly; and the next minute Dolly and her groom were left sole possessors of the field.

Dolly looked after the swift horses and fast-disappearing scarlet coats, and then with a little sigh turned Lady Golightly's head, and rode quietly homewards, with flushed cheeks and sweet lips which looked as if they held a happy secret.

"Is Mrs. Daunt in the morning-room?" she asked, as she stood for a moment in the pretty oak-panelled hall, her habit caught up over her arm.

"Mrs. Daunt is out, ma'am," was the servant's unexpected reply.

Dolly stared.

"Out?" she repeated, in surprise. "Walking?"

"No, ma'am. Mrs: Daunt is driving," The mystification on the pretty face deepened.

"Driving!" she repeated. "In the pony-carriage?"

"Yes, ma'am. Mrs. Daunt went quite alone."

"Without Hart?" asked Dolly quickly, almost incredulous, knowing that Sidney was but a timid charioteer.

"Yes, ma'am."

"How foolish—how imprudent of her!" Dolly thought, as she went slowly upstairs, to change her habit, "Those ponies are so uncertain, and Sidney seemed so unwell this morning. It was worse than foolish!"

Thoughts of Sidney's imprudence occupied her for some minutes; then pleasanter thoughts came—thoughts of the gray eyes which had looked so tenderly and reassuringly into hers, of the hand which had touched hers so kindly; and Dolly forgot everything else in the absorbing delight of that vision than which there is nothing in life so sweet—love's young dream.

Meanwhile the Cotley hounds were having a fairly good time of it. After a burst of some fifty minutes, which left some of the field in the rear, the fox got into a dense beech-wood and kept dodging about it for an hour and a half, puzzling the scent repeatedly, keeping the huntsmen winding in and out among the trees, risking their horse's legs in rabbit-holes, and, finally coming out at the other side of the wood, allowed them to turned?" she said in dismay, looking up from her flowers.

"Quite sure, ma'am," replied the man decidedly.

"I will wait half an hour," Dolly said hesitatingly. "Mrs. Daunt did not tell me that she would not be at home for luncheon."

She spoke quietly, hiding her dismay as much as possible, with a vague consciousness that her fears were absurd and ridiculous; and when the man had left her, she tried to resume her occupation. But the effort was vain; the fragrant blossoms had lost all charm for her, and she threw them aside and went over to the window, anxiously looking out and listening for the sound of Sidney's carriage-wheels.

The gray misty morning had grown up into a dull dreary day; the mist had become rain—a fine, drizzling, wetting rain, which hung heavily over the trees in the avenue, and made everything look sombre and melancholy. The sky was leaden-hued and scowling, and early in the day though it was still, the rooms looked dark and gloomy, notwithstanding the cheery firelight.

Whither could Sidney have gone? Dolly wondered anxiously going to the window for the twentieth time in as many minutes, and peering out anxiously into the misty rain. She had said so decidedly that she would not go out, that her head ached too much to allow her to drive to Cotley, and now she was out in her pony-carriage, without a servant, in the rain. Oh, surely there was some mistake—she had left a message which they had forgotten to deliver!

Ringing the bell, Dolly desired the servant who answered it to tell Mrs. Daunt's maid to come to her; and, when the coquettish little Frenchwoman appeared, she questioned her closely, but obtained no information likely to lessen her anxiety.

Madame had ordered the pony carriage immediately after mademoiselle and ces messieurs had departed. She seemed in great haste, and had spoken quite sharply to Hart, who had however brought the carriage round as soon as it was possible. Madame had refused to allow Hart's attendance and had gone quite alone, and she—Josephine—had really not dared to remonstrate.

"Madame did not say where she was going?" queried poor Dolly, sorry beyond words that she had questioned the Frenchwoman who had all her countrywomen's talent and love for intrigue, and whose significant looks were very displeasing to the sensitive young girl.

"Oh, no!" Josephine said, tightening her lips, with an expression which said as plainly as any words that, if madame had not wished to keep her destination secret she would not have gone out unattended.

"I should think she has gone to Lambswold to see my mother," said Dolly, affecting a careless manner. "That will do, Josephine. Tell Mills that he may bring in luncheon."

Dolly made a feint of eating luncheon, and returned to the drawing-room, restless and uneasy, telling herself that her fears were ridiculous and ungrounded, but unable to subdue them nevertheless. It was the first time that Sidney had driven out unattended, and her ponies had ney's return from her wedding-tour, and Dolly had been her guest at Easthorpe, he had haunted her pretty drawing-room persistently, and had become, as Sidney said sometimes, almost as regular as the institution of afternoon-tea itself.

"Good morning, Miss Daunt. Will you let me have the honor of escorting you to-day?" he said, as Dolly gave him a little gloved hand and a pretty smile of greeting.

"Thank you," the girl answered laughing; "Nichols is going to have that honor to-day."

"Nichols?" queried his lordship, elevating his straight dark brows.

"Yes, Nichols, my brother's groom," explained Dolly, laughing.

"Are you not going to follow?"

"No; I never hunt, you know. Let me introduce Mr. Milner to you," she added rather shyly. "Mr. Milner—Lord de la Poer."

Two stiff bows were made; the Earl's dark eyes glanced at the young lawyer's with an expression which seemed to ask, "Who are you, and what are you doing here?" and Lloyd returned the look with perfect calmness and composure.

"Is this your first visit to these parts, Mr.—Mr. Milner?" asked his lordship.

"Oh, no," Milner answered cooly, "not my first by several!"

"I have not had the pleasure of meeting you before, have I?"

"No; your lordship has generally been absent from home, I think."

"Ah, probably! Mrs. Daunt is not with you this morning, Miss Daunt?" asked the Earl, turning to Dolly again.

"No; Sidney preferred to stay at home."

"Too cruel of her! And you too are going to desert us!"

"I should be far too great a coward to do anything else," said Dolly, smiling, "Even now Lady Golightly is far too frisky for my peace of mind, and too crablike in her motions. I am afraid I shall not be able to hold her in," she added nervously, glancing appealingly at Lloyd, whose eyes brightened as he leaned forward and put his hand upon her bridle.

"I don't think you need fear," he said, smiling, with a tender protectiveness in his tone and manner which was anything but satisfactory to Lord de la Poer. "She is just a little excited, as we all are this morning; she will calm down again directly."

"Perhaps I had better return," she suggested dubiously.

"Oh, no!" he objected eagerly. "They will not find yet; and you must enjoy this pretty sight."

"Yes, it is very pretty," Dolly said; but, as her white lids were downcast and her golden lashes rested on a very pink cheek, it is doubtful whether she was contemplating the pretty sight just then; and the pretty sight which the young barrister was enjoying was not the meet with the gay coats and satin-colored horses, but a slender golden-haired girl, on a pretty roan mare, who looked just frightened enough to add to her prettiness.

There were several ladies in the field, most of whom "looked like business," as Lord de la Poer said in his languid tenor as he glanced at their short hunting habits tightly braided hair, and business-like appearance. Most of them too were surrounded by riders chatting and laughing huntsmen winding in and out among the trees, risking their horse's legs in rabbit-holes, and, finally coming out at the other side of the wood, allowed them to sight him for a moment, as he disappeared over the crest of some rising ground.

The excitement was intense, and shared equally by dogs, horses, and men. Lady Cotley, on her large-boned chestnut was well to the fore, Sir John Cotley, and Stephen Daunt were leading. The Hunt had thinned considerably, for some had been thrown out, and one or two of the less enthusiastic had been alarmed at the pace and the stiff ground; but Lloyd Milner was keeping up well with the rest although his horse was showing signs of distress, while the Earl was riding beside him neck to neck.

Straight before them were two meadows separated by a thick hedge from a ploughed field, into which the fox darted, the hounds yelling at his heels; but Reynard had cunning as well as speed by which to escape from his pursuers. He doubled, the hounds dashed on, and for a minute the scent was lost, then found again; and they went on pell-mell over the stiff ground.

Midway across the field many of the riders pulled up, deterred by a leap which awaited them at the end—a high quickset hedge on a bank between two ditches—a leap which not many could take. Some turned back, one or two turned to find another way; only three rode at the jump—Sir John Cotley, his wife, and Stephen Daunt. It was a foolish, daring leap, one only justifiable by the intense excitement of the moment. Lady Cotley's horse took it like a bird; her husband followed, slipped, but regained his footing and scrambled on. Lloyd Milner, glancing back at the moment, saw the third horse stumble and go headlong into the ditch, throwing his rider over his head. The next minute the horse was careering wildly after the hounds; but Stephen Daunt lay where he had been thrown, stunned and motionless.

CHAPTER XIX.

Having devoted nearly an hour to her pretty innocent dream of girlish love and future happiness, Dolly roused herself with a little self-reproach at her idleness, and, leaving her room, ran down lightly to the conservatories to gather flowers for the reception-rooms, a task she had arrogated to herself when Sidney, who at the Gray House had made it an unfailing duty—it being such a pleasure—had languidly given it up, saying the gardeners might do it.

It was a labour of love to Dolly, and she lingered over it, toying with the fragrant blossoms, arranging them with an artistic appreciation of their colours and hues, filling the old china bowls with roses and the slender Venetian specimen-glasses with buds of rare loveliness, until the drawing-room and Sidney's boudoir, were fragrant and beautiful with bloom.

She was still lingering over her pleasant task when a footman came to ask her if luncheon was to be served, or whether they were to wait for Mrs. Daunt; and Dolly started violently to find that the luncheon-hour had chimed some twenty minutes previously, and that Sidney had not yet returned.

"Are you sure Mrs. Daunt has not returned?"

"Quite sure, miss; I saw her ponies go round to the stables more than an hour ago."

Dolly's fears were ridiculous and ungrounded, but unable to subdue them nevertheless. It was the first time that Sidney had driven out unattended, and her ponies had been a very recent purchase.

Dolly tried to console herself by thinking that ill-news travelled apace, and that if anything had happened, she would have known it by now; but the attempt was almost a failure, and finally she took up her position in one of the deep seats of the hall windows, and sat, half shrouded by the heavy Eastern-looking curtains, looking out into the gray misty October day, all her pleasant thoughts of the morning swallowed up by her anxiety. How would she face Stephen on his return, she wondered, if she had to tell him that Sidney had met with an accident, had been hurt—killed perhaps? How would he bear it? Oh, it could not be! Surely, surely she was safe at Lambswold; or perhaps she had taken shelter elsewhere from the rain, and was waiting for it to clear off. Then, suddenly deciding that it was foolish to remain in this agony of snspense when she could so easily relieve it by sending a mounted groom to Lambswold, she sprang off the cushioned window-seat, and was just going to carry her intention into effect, when the sound of a horse's hoofs rapidly approaching struck upon her ear, and she turned back to the window. A horseman in splashed hunting garments was riding rapidly up to the house, urging his wearied horse to its utmost speed, and, as he came nearer, Dolly recognized Lloyd Milner, his face very pale and anxious.

"Something has happened," the young girl thought, a sudden strange calm coming over her, as she went quickly to the door and opened it, just as Milner swung himself from the saddle, threw the bridle to a servant who had come round at sound of the horse's hoofs, and met her on the threshold as he entered, splashed and breathless from the haste with which he had ridden.

"Dolly!" he exclaimed, as his eyes fell upon the graceful little figure and frightened blue eyes, uttering her name for the first time aloud and involuntarily putting out his hand and taking hers in his anxiety to soothe and comfort her.

"What has happened?" she said quietly, looking up at him and seeing how pale he was. "Sidney?"

"Where is she?" he asked hastily, still holding the little trembling hands, and looking down at her with a tenderness which thrilled her even in her anxiety.

"Is she not with you?" Dolly asked, the frightened look deepening in the fair young face,

"Is she not here?" he replied, answering her question by another.

"No; she is out. I thought you had come to tell me that——"

In the sudden revulsion of feeling she began to tremble so exceedingly that Milner put his arm round her to support her, and a great fear struck him that something else had happened to distress her besides this accident of which he had to tell her.

"What is it, Dolly?" he whispered gently, "Has anything happened to Mrs. Daunt?"

"No, no!" the girl said eagerly, trying to recover herself. "It was awfully stupid of me; but, when I saw you riding up alone in haste, I thought that she had met with an accident, and that you had come ——" She paused, trying to laugh, and hurriedly putting her hands to her eyes for a moment.

"She is out then?" he said, relieved that he was spared the necessity of telling Sidney of her husband's accident. "It is just as well perhaps."

"Why is it as well?" Dolly asked wonderingly. "I am anxious about her. It is so damp and cold, and she has been out for—— Mr. Milner, something is wrong!" she said suddenly. "Tell me. I could think only of Sidney; but—but——"

Her voice faltered and broke. Lloyd Milner's strong arm closed round her yet more tenderly.

"Dolly can you be very brave?" he asked gently.

"Yes," she said steadily. "You need not be afraid—I know—you need not tell me. Stephen has been thrown!"

"Yes."

"And—and he is killed!"

"No, no!" cried Miner hastily. "He is not even, I believe, seriously hurt. On my honour, Dolly, you may believe me!" he assured her, angry with himself, for having so alarmed her, yet almost willing to bless any chance which allowed him to put his arm round the slender drooping form. "He is hurt—not seriously—indeed I hope only slightly; but they are bringing him home, and I want you to see that all his ready for him. We have sent for Doctor Arnold. The Earl rode off for him at once."

"They are bringing him here," she echoed faintly. "He could not ride then?"

"My dear little girl, he was faint and giddy from his fall," he answered earnestly. "Indeed you may believe me, Dolly. Don't you trust me, dear?"

"Yes, yes," she answered hastily, then uttered a little cry of joy and sprang forward into her father's arms.

One of the gentlemen had ridden over to Lambswold to prevent any garbled account of Stephen's accident from reaching his father and mother, and Mr. Daunt, who had just driven home from Ashford, had immediately proceeded to Easthorpe. His presence was a great comfort to Dolly who struggled against her tears, cheered by his composure and strong gentle manner, so like his son's, and she was able to issue her directions with something like calmness. Just as she was turning away to see that they were properly carried out, a thought struck her.

"Does Sidney know, papa?" she asked quickly.

"Have you told her?" he said, looking a little surprised.

"How could I? Is she not at Lambswold?"

"At Lambswold? No; we have not seen her to-day. Good Heaven, Dolly, what is the matter?"

Dolly's explanation was almost an incoherent one, made between sobs that she could not repress; and although Mr. Daunt strongly repudiated the notion of any accident, he blamed Sidney's imprudence greatly, and looked even graver and more anxious than he had looked before.

MORSELS FOR SUNDAY CONTEMPLATION.

The Amateur Mind Reader.

"This mind-reading racket is all a fraud," remarked a gentleman who was sitting in front of the Capitol Hotel yesterday, to a group of friends.

"It seems there must be something in it," said another of the party; "the mind readers in London are succeeding in attracting large audiences and doing wonderful things."

"What is this fake, anyway?" said a cynical looking man, biting a half inch off the end of his cigar, and blowing it halfway across the street.

"Why some article is concealed, unknown to the mind-reader, or some object is thought of. Then the mind-reader takes the other man by the hand, and reading his mind through the contact of the fingers and wrist, leads him to the article thought of."

"Don't believe any such thing can be done," said another. "It's all nonsence."

"There must be something in it, for scientific men have investigated it and find they can't explain it."

"Well, suppose we try it once."

"All right. Who'll be the mind-reader?"

"I will."

"You think of something—some article or other," said the cynic. "Then this gentleman takes you by the wrist and leads you to it."

"Yes. Go ahead."

Then the amateur mind-reader took the doubter by the wrist, and then started up the street, the party following. It had been understood that the doubter was to keep the article in mind. The crowd followed.

When a point was reached opposite a store that bore a sign of "Fine Old Bourbon," the mind-reader paused.

"Astonishing!" exclaimed the party

The mind-reader was encouraged. He started in the open door.

"Keep your mind right on the article," he said. "Don't let up a minute or you'll bust the charm."

"You bet!" said the subject emphatically.

They passed through and stood in front of the bar.

"Give us that bottle of whiskey!" yelled the mind-reader, joyfully. "Who says I can't read a man thoughts? Wasn't that it, pard?"

"That was it. It's wonderfu how you could do it."

By this time the barkeeper had furnished every gentlemen with a glass; and made the custimary inquiry:

"What's yours, gents?"

They all said they'd take the same. But the mind-reader said he didn't call for the drinks. He had only been trying an experiment.

The barkeeper coldly remarked that the experiment would cost him ninety cents.

'By Jove, it is a fraud," said the mind-reader, as he passed over a stove-lid dollar and filled its place in his vest pocket with a Mexican dime.—Houston Post.

Bringing the Dead to Life.

TERRIBLE FAMILY TRAGEDY.

Shooting Down Wife, Daughter and Self

As Edward DeCamp of Boonton, New Jersey, was driving past the cottage of William W. Messer, formerly superintendent of the Boonton paper mill, with his sister, about 8 a. m. recently, he heard a woman shriek. Immediately afterward Mrs. Messer, the aged wife of the owner of the house, appeared in the doorway and screamed:

"Send Dr. Ryerson here at once."

Mr. DeCamp whipped up his horse and drove to Dr. Ryerson's, telling Enoch Hammond and Mary Jenkins, whom he met on the way, to go to the Messer house, as something was wrong. They started at once, and DeCamp arrived with Dr. Ryerson shortly after they did. The first thing to be seen on entering the cottage was the body of Mary Messer who lay stretched on the floor of the sitting-room, which is also used as a hall. She was alive and conscious, but was evidently terribly wounded. In the adjoining parlor Mrs. Messer sat on a chair in a corner. She also was desperately hurt. When the door of the dining-room in the rear, which was shut, was forced open the dead body of Mr. Messer was found lying against it in a pool of blood. A 38-calibre revolver, four barrels of which had been discharged lay beside him. A bullet hole was in his right temple.

According to the ante-mortem statement which Miss Messer made to Justice Dennis, acting as a Coroner, she and her mother had sat down to breakfast in the dining room shortly before 8 o'clock. Presently Mr. Messer entered, and sitting in the corner nearest to the door leading to the sitting-room began examining a revolver with which he had shot a dog last Sunday. Alarmed at the sight of the weapon, Miss Messer said:

"Father, put up that pistol; I don't like to see it. If you don't put it away I shall leave the room."

As Mr. Messer did not comply with her request, she arose and walked past him toward the sitting-room. She had just got past him when he fired at her, the ball striking her in the back. She walked a few steps further into the front room, and then fell where she was subsequently found lying. Mrs. Messer in terror tried to follow her daughter, but as she neared her husband he fired two shots. Her face was toward him. One bullet hit her in the breast and the other a little below. She tottered a few steps further, and laid herself down by her wounded daughter.

While mother and daughter thus lay side they heard a fourth pistol shot in the dining-room. After shooting his wife and daughter, Mr. Messer put the pistol to his right temple and shot himself through the head. Death must have been instantaneous. Mrs. and Miss Messer were both alive but neither is expected to recover. Miss Messer's spine is injured, and both legs are paralyzed. The bullet which entered Mrs. Messer's breast came out at the back. The other passed through the liver.

The cause of the shooting as the jury's verdict declares was insanity. Mr. Messer was sunstruck early in August, and his brain was sensibly affected. He disregarded the advice of his physician, Dr. Carpenter, and recently exposed himself

If youth only knew and age only could!

Wealth legitimately acquired is valuable, and it is only valuable when thus acquired.

Nothing is rarer in literary history than a scholar who confesses that he has been refuted in anything.

Nothing is great but the inexhaustable wealth of narure. She shows us only surfaces, but she is million fathoms deep.

A sordid love of money is certainly a very senseless thing, for the mind much occupied with it is blin to everything else.

When we find we are not liked we assert that we are not understood, when probably the dislike we have excited proceeds from our being too fully understood.

We may read, and read, and read again, and still find something new, something to please, and something to instruct.

Lov e thy wife and cherish her as long as hou livest. Flattery is better than roughness and will make her contented and diligent.

Emerson says "There is always safety in valor," but Emerson never was interviewed by a red headed woman, with a cold and relentless cowhide under her shawl.

Beware how you let words pass for more than they are worth, and bear in mind what alteration is sometimes produced in their current value by the course of time.

It is only through the morning gate of the beautiful that you can penetrate into the realm of knowledge; that which we feel here as beauty, we shall one day know as truth.

Resolve not to be poor. Whatever you have, spend less. Poverty is a great enemy to human happiness. It certainly destroys liberty, and it makes some virtues impracticable and others extremely difficult.

If the Spring put forth no blossoms, in Summer there will be no beauty, and in Autumn no fruit; so if youth be trifled away without improvement riper years will be contemptible and old age miserable.

A man's time when well husbanded, is like a cultivated field, of which a few acres produces more of what is useful to life, than extensive provinces, even of the richest soil, when overrun with weeds and brambles.

Conductor (contemptuously)—"Wot's this?" Passenger—"My ticket book." Conductor—"Tain't good on this road." Passenger, looking at the book, discovers that he has handed out his Testament by mistake—"No, I should say you had no be for it here."

"My son, you should not smoke twenty-five cent cigars." "Then you do not believe, father, the advice you have s often quoted from Shakespeare." "What is that?" "Costly thy habit as thy purse an buy."

a liquid state into the moulds left by the bodies in the soft ash did not occur to anyone till it suddenly flashed across Fiorelli about twenty years ago. Of the one hundred and eighty human beings discovered in Pompeii in the first hundred years of the excavations there is consequently only a written record. It is only from the "Journal of Excavations" for the year 1831 that we know of the touching and famous sight which greeted the eyes of the first discoveries of the "House of the Fauna." On the floor of the banqueting hall lay the body of a woman, probably the mistress of the house, with her jewels scattered where she had thrown them in despair of rescue or escape. The roof had been crushed in by the weight of falling ash and pumice stone, and the hands of the dying woman were upstretched in a vain effort to keep off the impending weight. Parts of the body and clothing could still be made out and a drawing could be made of a charming foot. But such records are lifeless and tame indeed beside the extraordinary portrait statutes which are now to be seen in the live musuem at Pompeii. There are nine of these, or were a short time since, and to see them is like seeing the men and women themselvess of eight centuries ago. Fiorelli's method is as simple as possible. A small opening is made, the plaster delicately poured in, and when it has had time to harden, the surface crust of ash is peeled of, and the man or woman comes back to life again. The details of clothing and feature have all left their mark on the soft ash, and are all faithfully preserved in the plaster cast.

The results achieved by Fiorelli are striking and complete. Take the cast of the elderly slave, for instance, probably a man of somesixty years old who appears to have been taking his siesta when the eruption began, and to have been painlessly asphyxiated in his sleep. He lies on the right side, the knees a little bent, the left leg drawn up, and the cheek resting on the right hand. The coarse, strongly-marked features, and peaceful expression of the sleeper, have all been perfectly preserved. A hardly less easy death must have been the lot of the four persons found lying on their backs in the street. Three of these were men, one of them a negro of the most pronounced type. The fourth was a woman of unusual stature whose time for becoming a mother was not far off. The three persons found lying on their faces do not appear to have found quite so easy a death. Two of them are women. One of them an elderly woman with a thin figure, lies by herself, her face buried in her arms, as if to protect herself from the fatal rain. The other lies side by side with a man in whose company she appears to have taken flight. She has covered her face with a fold of her dress and the hands are tightly clenched in the last throe of the death agony.—English Paper.

garded the advice of his physician, Dr. Carpenter, and recently exposed himself to the sun. The intense heat of the past werk caused him to grow worse. Before his sunstroke he had the reputation of being eccentric. He ate but one meal a day like Goethe, and that at 4 o'clock in the afternoon. He smoked incessantly sometimes almost continuously for sixteen hours at a time. He spent his nights in reading, and slept in the daytime. Before last February, however, he kept more regular hours, as he was obliged to do, being until then superintendent of the Boonton paper mill. He gave up his position because of a disagreement with the members of the company. He went to Boonton about four years ago. Previous to that he was interested in gold mines in Colorado. Previous to that he was in the sugar business in Boston, where he is said to have had Warren Fisher, the father of Blaine's friend Warren Fisher, jr., for a partner, and also to have had a brother-in law of Blaine's for another partner. Blaine himself is said to have been a bookkeeper of the firm. Mr. Messer went to California shortly after the gold discovery ann before that he was a dealer in hardware in Maiden Lane in New York.

During the war Mr. Messer was a carrier of secret despatches between this country and England. He knew something of medicine, and had a smattering of other professional knowledge, While he and his family lived plainly, keeping no servants, he seemed always to have plenty of money. He carried himself erectly, and kept his full white beard and hair well trimmed. Mrs. Messer's age is 72, Miss Messer's is 35. There is a son about 40 in California, and the youngest of the family is Arthur J. Messer, who is in the paper business in New York. He was formerly connected with the mill of which his father was superintendent. He sometimes lost his temper with the mill-hands, and he was so conscious of his failing that he began to think every one disliked him.

Mr. Messer got his revolver put in order on Thursday. When somebody who saw him carrying it asked, "What are you doing with a pistol?" he answered. "I want it in good order." His shooting the dog on Sunday is believed to be due more to an insane impulse than to a belief that it had hydrophobia.

A Rattlesnake in Church.

From the Tallahasse Land of Flowers.

A large congregation had assembled at River Sink Church. When the pastor was at the height of one of his most brilliant theological flights a terrible commotion was noticed near one of the entrances. In the middle of the aisle, thickly crowded on both sides with men, women, and children, lay a monster rattlesnake, seven feet long, with ten rattles and a button.

"Ain't you almost boiled?" inquired a child of a gentleman calling on her father and mother. "No, little one, I can't say that I am. On the contrary, I feel quite comfortable." "That's funny. I should think you would be." "Why, so, Daisy?" "Oh, because I heard mamma say your wife kept you in hot water all the time."

SHOCKING DOMESTIC TRAGEDY.

A Wronged Husband Shoots his Faithless Wife and her Paramour.

For several days Mr. Thomas M. Jackson, proprietor of the Atlanta Box Factory, had imagined that he could detect a handkerchief flirtation between his wife and Mr. Will McDonald, a saloon keeper across the street. For fourteen years he had lived happily with his wife, and five interesting children had been born to them. He tried to repress suspicion, but it continued to grow upon him. Recently he announced to his wife that he was going north on the evening train. He secreted himself during daylight, and, arming himself with a shotgun and revolver, he awaited the night's developments. No sooner had Mr. Jackson departed than the following note was sent across the street by his wife:

Mr. Willie McDonald.

SIR: If you wish you can call tonight. My husband will be gone. Cal- at 10 o'clock. Come back way. Let me know if you are coming. Yours truly,

M. J. J.

Hastily closing his place of business as 9 o'clock, McDonald jumped the back fence, a dark object following slowly after him. Mrs. Jacksom met him at the door and fell into his arms. The door was closed, but the avenger was peeping through the chamber blinds. Soon the revelations were sufficient to confirm his worst suspicions, and, raising his shotgun, he fired a load of buckshot into the bed With a scream, McDonald jumped up and wildly discharged his pistol in the direction of the window. He attempted to escape, but found the windows barred and the doors locked. Meantime Jackson had run to the front door to give the departing guest a shot as he came out. He saw a figure coming, and he blazed away, when his wife, whom it proved to be, sank down on the steps mortally wounded. McDonald came directly after her, firing his revolver wildly in his fright, and Jackson winged him again.

By this time half a dozen police and fully five hundred people who had been awakened by the fusillade of musketry had gathered at the house. The wounded woman, in her death agony, was taken to a house across the street and the two men were taken to the police station. Inside the Jackson house a frightful scene was presented. Five little children, who had been put away in their cribs for the night by the mother, were running around the rooms in their night clothes crying with terror. The wounded couple cannot live. Mrs. Jackson was a member of the Baptist Church, and the family has always moved in the best circles.

The Newsboy's Hard Luck

He had a bundle of papers under his arm and was standing near the Brooklyn Bridge weeping. "What is the matter little boy?" asked a pleasant faced gentleman. "If I go home without selling me papers me' fether and mother will bate the life out of me." "That's bad." "Yes, sor; but the worst of it is that I am an only orphint." "Yes," replied the philanthropist, allowing a nickel to drop back into his pocket, "only it doesn't

FOREIGN NEWS.

A New Piano—A Shocking Discovery—Some French Census Figures, &c., &c.

The report of the British commissioners of patents for the year 1883, states that the number of applications for letters datent during the year was 5,993, being 248 less than the preceding year.

The dress of a native woman of British India consists of a "serree." This is five yards of cloth without a stitch in it. If the woman is married there is a red strip in it, about half an inch wide, around the edge of the "serree." The cloth is first wound around the waist and falls to the ankles. Then it is thrown up over the shoulder, and the same garment makes a head-dress. The men are dressed on as simple a plan.

A recent article in the Journal des Economistes gives the following particulars as to the amount of food consumed in Paris during 1882: Fish, 27,293,312 kilogrammes (one kilogramme — 2.21 pounds); oysters, 5,332,726; fowl and game, 24,622,623; meat, 32,797,305; butter, 17,408,737; eggs, (20 to a kilogramme) 21,074,338; cheese, 6,967,357; fruit and vegetables, 20,444,777; bread-353,040,997; wine, 4,500,000 hectolitres (one hectolitre—22 gallons).

The prefect of the Seine has just published the returns of the last census, from which it appears that Paris then had 2,239,928 inhabitants, of whom 1,113,326 were males, and 1,126,602 females. When the previous census was taken in 1876 the total was 1,988,806, so that there had been an increase of 251,122. There were 68,126 inhabited houses, and 2,075,800 of the inhabitants were French by birth, the foreigners numbering 91,972 males and 75,542 females, consisting of 45,281 Belgians, 31,190 Germans, 21,547 Italians, 20,810 Swiss, 10,789 English, 5,987 Americans, and 65 Chinese.

A murderous assault was made recently on M. Constant Tripart, lately a judge of the Dijon court of appeal, by a released convict named Marquis, who in 1875 was condemned to five years' imprisonment for murder by M. Tripart. M. Tripart, who is 71 years of age, was leaving church on Sunday morning with his son when Marquis fired two bullets at him, one of which lodged in his loin and the other in his leg. M. Tripart's son attempted to grapple with the aggressor, but received a shot from the revolver, which struck him to the ground. The man then tried to escape across the fields, but was captured. It appears that Marquis on finishing his term had worked as a journeyman molder, and was intent on securing the life of the judge who had sentenced him.

The prominent feature of the present autumnal movement of travellers says the Glasgow Herald, is the extraordinary numbers of first-class passengers which are being taken by each of the various Atlantic steamer lines leaving London, Liverpool, and Glasgow for America. The rush, it seems, began with the past month of August, and every week since an increasing stream of travellers have crowded the ocean racers from Liverpool to overflowing, whilst the ordinary steam ers of the several lines have all been extra as much as we are in ours." The plague, therefore, still prevails over the city, but a Dresden pianoforte firm has, it appears, found a way out of the difficulty by constructing a dumb piano—that is, an instrument the sound of which is so far reduced by a strong felt border between hammers and strings that the music can only be sufficiently heard by the player to enable him to distinguish between the chords. If it is true that the mechanism of the piano suffers in no way by the insertion of the felt, the Dresden firm may well be congratulated on its ingenious invention, and next-door neighbors all over the world will clamorously demand that legislators should make the use of felt universally compulsory.

The Geysers of New Zealand.

The Geyser Valley of Wairakei is one of the most marvellous creations of its kind to be found perhaps in any part of the world. It forms, as it were, one of the principal arteries of thermal action which which would seem to extend from the volcano of Tongariro in the south through the lake region to Whatkori, the active crater in the Bay of Plenty, in the east. The bottom of the valley is situated at an elevation of 1,000 feet above the level of the sea, while down its centre, which was a gradual fall to the east, a warm stream of water, known as Te Wairakei, flows rapidly on its course to join the Waikafo. Its steep, winding sides rise in some places to a height of over 200 feet, and above these again flat terraces spread out bounded by clusters of conical, fern-clad hills, which mount upward, as it were, in increasing elevation to the heights beyond. Looking down the valley from one of the elevations one sees the winding course of the great fissure filled with a dense growth of vegetation, forced into vigorous life, as it were, by the white clouds of steam that mount into the air on every side. There is one great charm about the Geyser Valley of Wairakei, and that is that it is not a melancholy, dismal-looking place. It has not the Hades-like appearance of Tikitere nor the Valley-of-Death-like look of Whadarewarewa. One is at once struck with the varied growth of vegetation which everwwhere abounds, the luxuriance of the trees, the rich beauty of the ferns and the vivid green of the thick carpet of rare and beautiful mosses which spread itself everywhere about the margin of the stream be low to the very tops of the steep, smoking cliffs. Every geyser, spring, and mud hole has its clustering vegetation, and as you grope your way through the thick undergrowth along the tortuous stream each thermal wonder bursts suddenly upon the view with a fresh and startling beauty. As we descended into the valley by a tortuous pathway, we heard the rushing of waters below, as the turbulent stream beneath swept onward over a series of miniature cascades: then the noise of hissing steam bursts upon the ear, the heated ground seemed to quake beneath our feet, the boiling mud holes send forth a noise like the incessant "thud" of a steam hammer, which mingled in a weird way with the loud roar and splashing of the geysers as they threw up their columns of boiling water above the trees. Gazing anywhere, up and down the valley, some of the most back into his pocket, "only it doesn't often happen that a boy has such hard luck.

"Can't you walk anywhere except on my feet?" demanded an exasperated passenger on the rear platform of a horse car of a good looking lad who had just jumped on. "You can see for yourself that it would be rather difficult, sir," returned the lad politely. And then everybody laughed and tried to get a view of the passenger's shoes.

HALL'S Vegetable Sicilian

was the first preparation perfectly adapted to cure diseases of the scalp, and the first successful restorer of faded or gray hair to its natural color, growth, and youthful beauty. It has had many imitators, but none have so fully met all the requirements needful for the proper treatment of the hair and scalp. HALL'S HAIR RENEWER has steadily grown in favor, and spread its fame and usefulness to every quarter of the globe. Its unparalleled success can be attributed to but one cause: the entire fulfilment of its promises.

The proprietors have often been surprised at the receipt of orders from remote countries, where they had never made an effort for its introduction.

The use for a short time of HALL'S HAIR RENEWER wonderfully improves the personal appearance. It cleanses the scalp from all impurities, cures all humors, fever, and dryness, and thus prevents baldness. It stimulates the weakened glands, and enables them to push forward a new and vigorous growth. The effects of this article are not transient, like those of alcoholic preparations, but remain a long time, which makes its use a matter of economy.

ers of the several lines have all been extra well filled for the season of the year. The reason given for this unusual spurt in the passenger-carrying trade to America is the fact that the presence of cholera in the southern portions of France and Italy, causing those who depended upon a continental tour for their autumn vacation to change their route for a trip across the "herring pond," and a closer acquaintance with our American cousins on their own side of it.

A shocking discovery has been made near Castletownroche, Ireland. Some seven years ago a Mrs. Sheehan, her son, and daughter, mysteriously disappeared from their home and farm, about which the woman had had a dispute with her son. The people of the district were led to believe that these people had gone to America, but the discovery of a few days ago would tend to show that they were murdered. There was a well in an adjoining farm twenty-five feet deep, from which the owner of the farm, a Mr. Broderick, drew his supplies of water. Owing to the recent dry summer the water in the well ran low, and a man was sent down to clear it out. He discovered in the bottom of the well the skeletons of three bodies, which a doctor has pronounced to be the remains of two females and a male, which agrees with the loss of Mrs. Sheehan and her son and daughter. A portion of a cloak and of boots similar to those which would be worn by a woman, in Mrs. Sheehan's position in life were found.

Owing to the unusual slackness of business in Paris, consequent upon the almost total absence of visitors this season, the report of the failure of another of the great cafes on the boulevard will excite no surprise. Following closely upon the discomfiture of the proprietors of the Cafe du Helder came that of the leaseholders of the Grand cafe. These disasters have now been followed by that of the Cafe du Suede, which had acquired a certain amount of celebrity. Established in 1860, this cafe soon acquired a good custom, thanks to its exceptionally advantageous position, and became the rendezvous of actors and the minor writers on the press. Since the war it has passed through the hands of several different owners, the last of whom, a cafe owner of Lyons, added a cheap restaurant to the ordinary business. Though in liquidation, the cafe is not likely to be closed, a receiver having been appointed to continue the business on behalf of the creditors. The Cafe du Suede is one of the thirty-three cafes or restaurants along the boulevard from the Madeleine to the Faubourg Montmartre, irrespective of the numerous establishments crowding the side streets.

After much pain and suffering, says the Pall Mall Gazette, a remedy has at last been discovered for the piano plague, of which the citizens of Berlin have been bitterly complaining. Legislation was for a long time believed to be the only cure; but the conviction is growing that Prof. Hanslik, the musical composer, was right when he declared in the Gartenlaube that "nobody has either the right or the power to influence the piano vampire by any means whatever. He is master in his own house and at his own piano just up and down the valley, some of the most beautiful and curious sights presented themselves. The warm stream which gathered its waters from the overflowing geysers and springs wound its course amid the trees, sparkling and glittering beneath the sun. In some places its sides were entirely fringed with silicious deposits, some white and beautiful like overhanging folds of lace, some dipping down into the water in the form of enormous stalactites while others, assuming a rounded buttress-like formation, were green with ferns and dank mosses of varied hue. At another moment a rocky point came into view, and above the clustering ferns, brilliant in the soft rays of light, the tall manuka trees, which here attained to wonderful proportions, cast their gnarled branches in a dense canopy overhead, and from the very water's edge, where the warm springs bubbled and hissed, to the very summit of the valley on either side, the heated soil gave life to countless wonders of the great vegetable world.

The Secret of Mr. Gladstone's Vigor.

In the latest Healthery Handbook, subject "Athletics," by the Hon. E. Lyttelton, we find the following excellent remarks on the duty of chewing food:—

The veriest dullard who thinks for a moment on the daily task entrusted to our digestive machinery, how incessantly it recurs, and how serious are the issues involved in its fulfilment; and who has, moreover, learned anything of the delicacy of those organs, and their close relation to happiness, will understand the need of lightening that task as far as we can, and the cruelty of any wanton increase of it. Our system asks for food well chewed and well lubricated, and we give it dry nuggets, at rapidly-recurring meals. . . . I could name a dyspeptic, who travelled in search of a cure all in vain, till a stranger told him to masticate his meat, and he obtained instant relief. But there is a better instance at hand than either of these. Mr. Gladstone is a man about whose physical vigor there can be no question. Men are known in troublesome times to cavil at his statesmanship, but no one has anything to say against his digestion. Now, as early as the year 1848, Mr. Gladstone formulated to himself rules for chewing food. Previously to that he had always paid great attention to this requirement of nature; but at that date he laid down a rule for his children that thirty-two bites should be given to each mouthful of meat, and a somewhat lesser number to bread, fish, etc. It is also known that to get into a habit of following his example is as easy as can be. A little attention paid to it for two days will insure the duty being unconsciously performed through life, with the most beneficial results. Truly, history turns upon small causes! The philosopher of future ages may busy himself with pondering what the course of the world would have been had that number been twenty-two instead of thirty-two.

A Strange African People.

In the course of a paper read by him in the geographical section of the British association, Gen. Lefroy said: Having alluded to Dr. Paul Pogge, whose death at Loanda in March last deprives geography of an adventurous explorer, I may add that the account of his journey in 1875 to Mussumba, the capital of the powerful negro kingdom of Muata Yanvo, or Matianvo of Livingstone, published in 1880, remains to be translated. That great traveller failed to reach it. Cameron crossed the territory, but a long way to the south of it, and no previous traveller that I am aware of has described it. Dr. Pogge resided there four or five months. and we learn many interesting particulars from him, and from Dr. Max Buchner, a subsequent traveller.

The people, although fetish worshippers, practice the rite of circumcision; they are a fine, warlike, race, unhappily addicted to slave hunting, but far in advance of their cannibal brothers of Kauanda. Their institutions are of a feudal character; Muata Yanvo is an hereditary title. Among many peculiar customs is one which invests one of the king's half-sisters, under the designation of the lukokescha, with the second authority in the kingdom. She is forbidden to marry, but permitted a sort of morganatic alliance with a slave, any offspring being ruthlessly destroyed, and on the death of the king she has the principal voice in designating his successor, who, however, must be selected from among the sons of the late king. Since Dr. Pogge's visit the Muata Yanvo has been deposed and poisoned by his lukokescha. The extraordinary custom prevails here that a man's children do not belong to him, but to the eldest brother of their mother, and should a child die the father must make compensation.

A Plucky Engineer.

Many plucky engineers have crawled down on the cowcatcher of their locomotive, as the machine was rushing along at the rate of twenty miles an hour, and snatched a child or baby from certain destruction beneath the ponderous wheel of the iron horse, but none have as yet the experience of Christoval Mendoza, an engineer on the Mexican railroad. The other day as the train was nearing Jalapa, he discovered an old beggar, 101 years, on the track. The old fellow being deaf and imbecile, paid no attention to the shrieks of the whistles, so Christoval climbed down on the cowcatcher, snatched the old fellow almost mummified with fright, up into a safe berth beside him just as the monster was about to grind him into a thousand fragments.

Made Sane by a Jump.

On the train recently was Miss Ichmann of Milwaukee, who was sent West in charge of her mother in the hope that the change might avert threatened brain troubles. When near Laramie, Miss Ichmann jumped from the car window. It was some time before she was missed, and after telegraphic inquiry she was heard from at Laramie, where she had been taken by the crew of a freight train. In jumping Miss Ichmann fell in front of the freight train, and was terribly bruis-

Catarrh—A New Treatment.

Perhaps the most extraordinary success that has been achieved in modern science has been attained by the Dixon Treatment of catarrh. Out of 2,000 patients treated during the past six months, fully ninety per cent. have been cured of this stubborn malady. This is none the less startling when it is remembered that not five per cent. of the patients presenting themselves to the regular practitioner are benefitted, while the patent medicines and other advertised cures never record a cure at all. Starting with the claim now generally believed by the most scientific men that the disease is due to the presence of living parasites in the tissues, Mr. Dixon at once adapted his cure to their extermination; this accomplished the catarrh is practically cured, and the permanency is unquestioned, as cures effected by him four years ago are cures still. No one else has ever attempted to cure catarrh in this manner, and no other treatment has ever cured catarrh. The application of the remedy is simple and can be done at home, and the present season of the year is the most favorable for a speedy and permanent cure the majority of cases being cured at one treatment. Sufferers should correspond with Messrs. A. H. DIXON & SON, 305 King-street West, Toronto, Canada, and enclose stamp for their treatise on catarrh.—Montreal Star.

"Pa, is lye awfully bitter?" "Yes, my son, it's very bitter indeed." "Well, will it poison anybody?" "I guess it would, if you took enough of it." "Why don't more people die then? I read in a paper that the public was made to swallow great deal of campaign lie."

The musical and literary sections of this organization purpose giving an entertainment to open the season in about a fortnight. Thursday, the 28th inst, has been named as the day for the opening of a series of popular concerts and readings to be continued throughout the winter. TOWN COUNCIL.

A meeting of the Town Council was held Wednesday evening. The business transacted was merely of a routine character. The Street Committee made their report recommending no action in the matter of the wire fence erected by Mr. S. Gibson because they considered it not substantially built. They also recommended a new sidewalk, 6 feet 6 inches, on the west side of John-st., from Mr. Daly's store to Bridge-st., and rebuilding a culvert on Robinson-st. The report was adopted, except the clause respecting the fence, which was deferred till next meeting. The committee on the entertainment for relief of the Port Perry fire sufferers reported a deficit of $26.60; that the printers had cancelled their bills and that Mr. Symington would accept $12 in full payment. This was ordered to be paid. A number of accounts were passed, after which the council adjourned.

A Correction.

[To the Editor of THE EXPRESS.]

SIR,—In your last issue I noticed a short paragraph headed "A Painful Accident." Will you please allow me to correct it and give the true facts of the case, as the person who gave you the information must have been some one who knew nothing about the case whatever? The poor unfortunate young man does not blame any person but himself, neither does any of his fellow-workmen, as they all knew the switch had been changed and were working only a few yards from the switch. The young fellow had forgotten about the switch being changed and in stepping back as he supposed to get out of the way of the train stepped in front of her; therefore, as he says himself, no blame can be attached to anyone but himself, and any one who knew anything about the case would not sentence another. Yours truly,

G. P. HOUGH, Switchman.

"Miss Lillian Terry surpassed herself last night as the New York Belle, being recalled after every act. Miss Esther Lyon, as the Farmer's Daughter, created a most pleasing impression. Miss Emma Frank, as Mother Stark in Poverty Hollow, and Miss Etta Frank as Little Minnie's attendant, were most acceptable. Little Minnie showed herself as clever as ever in her important part. We specially direct attention to the fine stock of gentlemen's fur caps and overcoatings. They are prepared to make up to order overcoatings of any kind and quality of fur. The stock of hats, caps and gents' furnishings will also be found very replete and is deserving of a visit of inspection.

SIR,—Noticing a very extraordinary letter in your issue of the 19th inst., pointing directly to me, I hope you will allow me to say a few words in reply. In the first place I wish to state that I have carefully read the whole of Antler's letters and can vouch for the truth of every word contained in them, but am sorry to say that I cannot do the same for your Cloyne correspondent, as his statement that he had a full gang of men, numbering thirteen, working on Barrie road, No 2, on July 11th, 1884, is absolutely false. There was not that number on Barrie road, No. 2 on that day, even including the interested visitors and a man and his wife that chanced to pass along the road. Then he says in his letter that Antler used unbecoming language to his lady visitors. Antler alluded to them as in different degrees of relationship to himself, and if that is any disgrace it must arise from their relationship with him, but this is not the whole of it; as in his wrath (keep cool, John) he must needs alude to a respectable lady that once had the misfortune to be a widow, who is proud to say that she is no relation of his. Then how can he justify himself in including her in his dirty slang. I will not pursue the subject further by administering the severe castigation he deserves, as it is of no use, for where there is no sense there is no feeling, but will treat him as the boy did that other donkey, impute it to his ignorance, as, poor thing, he knows no better.

—The Napanee fair is popular in this neighborhood; fifty-four tickets were bought at the station here and a large number went with their teams. The weather was all that could be desired.

—George Graham has returned home after an absence of a few years to recruit his health.

—Herbert Cannon is here alive and visiting his home. It was between Harrowsmith and Sharbot Lake that the blunder was made.

—George McDonald is buying grain and he will pay the highest price going.

—The chairman of the committee reports that they are meeting with great success in procuring signatures to the petition for the incorporation of the two villages. They are waiting for the sub-committee of Colebrooke to finish. They have partially agreed on the name of the united villages and they would recommend to call it "Benjamin Falls," as appropriate.

—The ballasting on the road from here to Tamworth is about completed.

—The Italians arrived here from Tamworth on Tuesday evening and occupied the church shed which sheltered them and their luggage. They left Wednesday by teams for Harrowsmith to go to work on the K. & P. RR. They were quiet and peaceable, as they have always been while here. They wanted their pay before they left for another job.

Hoselton on quitting business as undertaker a few months ago, had on hand some twenty hand-made orthodox coffins, the relics of the medæval times, and he has succeeded, he informs us, in selling the whole lot to a maiden lady and her sister of this municipality, at a nominal sum. The ladies in question, though still hale and hearty, have selected their burial spots in the English Church cemetry at this place, and have had their tombstones erected. The undertaker says they desire to be laid away in the smallest caskets, which are to be telescoped into the larger ones, until each one is encased in ten of his wooden overcoats. This will be equal to the embalming process of the Mosiac dispensation, and far more humane than the "cremating furnacerios" now so much lauded in France and the other countries of the old world. These two ladies are full communion members of the Methodist church, and attend regularly divine service therein, and why they should have selected burying plots in the Church of England cemetery is a puzzle to the natives. It would seem to show that the Methodist doctrine, though good to live by, is not good enough to be laid away with finally.

DISTURBING THE ARMY.—A young man, acting as grain thresher for Mr. Vanslyck, named Alverson, disturbed the meeting on Saturday evening last, by behavior unbecoming any youth possessed of brains. The laws of this country when carried into effect make it extremely warm for youths of this class, for displaying their idiocy in places of public worship, and they had better take warning and govern themselves as civilized beings when assembled in the house of God, or they may find themselves peeping through the bars of "Castle Vanluven."

RETIRING FROM BUSINESS.—Mr. D. Grasse, of Collinsby, a wealthy farmer, is about buying a lot at Bath with the intention of removing here next spring.....Mr. George Cook, a well-to-do yeoman of Parrot's Bay, is also similarly inclined, and was here in company with his wife this week, selecting a spot to build on. We welcome them to our village, and will do all in our power to make their stay among us an agreeable one.

REAL ESTATE.—Mr. Joseph Dennee, late at South Fredericksburgh, is about purchasing a house and lot on the north side of Main street, from Mr. Mark Rowse, of Ernesttown.....Mr. John Hogle, H. M. Customs, is busily engaged in rebuilding a house on his premises on the south side of Main street, and Mr. Thomas Edwards has given the contract for raising and remodeling his house on the water's edge....We were in error last week in stating that Mr. Morrow, of Emerald, would build a summer hotel at the upper end of the town. He will, it is said, build some tenement flats on his property here in lieu of the hotel. We hope he may do so, as tenement houses are very scarce, and if built would add much to the prosperity of our village.....Mr. D. W. Ball intends to erect a fine residence for himself and family at the foot of Davy street, overlooking his mill property.

—The board of health are doing a good work. Their inspector has notified the board of the nuisances in their midst, and the board have ordered their removal. The people generally acquiesce in the demands as issued by the board, and our village is fast assuming what nature intended it to be, the most healthy spot in the county.

A Popular Fallacy.

Many people think that Rheumatism cannot be cured. It is caused by a bad state of the blood which deposits poisonous matter in the muscles and joints, causing lameness, stiffness and swelling of the joints and excruciating pain. Kidney-Wort will certainly effect a cure. It acts on the Kidney, Liver and Bowels, stimulating them to a healthy action, purifies and enriches the blood and eliminates the poison from the system. Go to the nearest druggist, buy Kidney-Wort and be cured.

IRATE ITALIANS.

40 NAVIES ATTACK A CONTRACTOR.

The Tamworthites Suppress the Row in a Summary Manner.—Several of the Italians Injured.

[From our own Correspondent.]

The ballasting on the N. T. & Q. RR., being about completed and the contractors, Messrs. Chisholm, McDonald and O'Brien, wishing to transfer the majority of their laborers to the works at Calabagie Lake on K. & P. RR., the general overseer (Mr. O'Brien) desired them to take the train for the above named place. This they refused to do until they got their pay for the work done here. They also refused to allow twenty-five of their comrades to go to work in the pit here, driving them from the train with clubs and stones. They then followed Mr. O'Brien around town in a threatening manner until about twelve o'clock, when they pitched upon him at Douglass' Hotel and threatened to take his life unless he would pay them at once, This he could not do as the contractors had not come with the money. He was then taken to the middle of the street by a gang armed with revolvers and dirks, when the citizens went to his aid. The crowd surged across to C. Shield's door, an attempt was made to get him in, and as Mr. Shield's took him by the collar a dirk was immediately thrust at him cutting his hand. The Italians then got the advantage and started towards the bridge with O'Brien. All hope of saving his life now seemed to be gone, when J. M. Smith rushed into the infuriated mob and rescued him single-handed and alone. O'Brien then fled to his hotel and the maddened devils turned upon his rescuer with dirks and revolvers, and while the glittering daggers were descending and just about to enter his body a gallant charge of villagers led by John Sherman, J. P., armed with clubs, guns, pieces of iron and swords, came to his rescue, when the clubs in the powerful hands of J. R. Fraser, John A. Fraser, L. A. Wheeler, C. S. Wheeler, L. Wagar, Reeve ; Wm. Brown, Deputy-Reeve ; Edward McLaughlin, Councillor ; W. N. Somers, Wm. Bragg and others soon rescued him from his perilous position. His escape is looked upon as miraculous, for with the exception of a few bruires, he was unhurt. But now the scene beggars all description. A desperate hand to hand fight ensued with all kinds of weapons, in which the rioters outnumbered the citizens about five to one, but we were fighting for our lives and our property, and by desperate work gained a little advantage. Our little band now began to be pretty well fatigued, when J. M. Smith got hold of a double-barrelled gun and discharged both barrels over the heads of the rioters. This had the effect of causing them to fall back for an instant, but on they came again, when he emptied both barrels fair into the mob. This had the desired effect, for they at once retreated and victory was ours.

THE FOLLOWING VILLAGERS WERE HURT:

James R. Fraser, left arm badly bruised by blows from clubs; J. A. Fraser, both arms badly bruised by blows from clubs; W. N. Somers, constable, two stabs in the left breast obliquely, or his heart would have been pierced; William Brown, councillor, stabbed over the right shoulder blade; Edward McLaughlin, councillor, knocked flat by a stone ; the reeve got a blow from a stone but was not badly hurt. John Somers, J.P., who led the attempt at rescue, had a very narrow escape from a blow on the head with an axe. His son John got knocked flat by a club in rescuing his father, but is not seriously hurt.

The Italians were badly punished, while our brave boys were pretty badly injured also. All are doing well under the care of Dr. Yourex. He also fixed up the wounds of the rioters. Honorable mention should be made of the following citizens :—J. R. Fraser, J. A. Fraser, L. A. Wheeler, C. S. Wheeler, John Sherman, J. P. ; John Sherman, Jr. ; W. M. Bragg, Sr. ; Wm Bragg, Jr. ; W. N. Somers, L. Wagar, Wm. Brown, Edward McLaughlin, J. M. Smith and Jas. Keller. British soldiers, nor Zulus, never fought better, and had they not fought as they did they would all have been killed and the town sacked. Captain Cox was now sent for, who came with arms and called out a squad who kept the Italians on the east side of the river all night and made twenty-one arrests.

It being impossible to tell who did the stabbing and shooting they could only be tried for assault. It cost them $130. They were then given notice to leave town by the first train or be driven out at the point of the bayonet. They took the train and left. Peace and quietness now reigns. Two of the contractors (Messrs. O'Brien and McDonald) appeared on the scene on the 7th and paid the men off in full.

COUNTY NEWS.

Napanee Mills.

[Correspondence of THE EXPRESS.]

—The quiet of our little village has been disturbed lately by the inmates and frequenters of one of the tenement houses on what is known as the Devil's E'bow, and the devil himself has been there lately having full sway. The inmates are a man, his wife, mother and a young married woman who has parted from her husband. The house was visited Sunday by three Deseronto roughs and the night was made hideous by these drunken brawlers, and on Monday morning the exposition of the persons of these parties was something that should not be tolerated for one moment. Surely the owner of the house cares something for the reputation of the place and will not allow such things to continue to disgrace a respectable community.

Yarker.

[Correspondence of THE EXPRESS]

—Work has commenced on the station here, which is much needed to accommodate the increasing travel and freight traffic. Colebrook station is completed and there is no movement to open a road, except that one of the directors in an underhand way is prompting the Colebrookers to demand a road from the company. Mr. Rathbun ought to give him the grand bounce, as he has been the main cause of all the trouble between Colebrook, Yarker and the Company about this station, to gratify some private malice he has against some one in Yarker and it cuts him bad to see a station built at Yarker.

—The parties who had the row at Centreville fair came to a settlement before bringing it into court, by the defendant paying costs.

—The band serenaded the village Saturday evening. There is a marked improvement in their playing.

—The double dwelling house built by Mr. J. A. Shibley was occupied as soon as completed. R. Marseilles occupies one part. It is something new for him to build fires and carry water. Such is life. R. Freeman occupies the other end. He has retired from his farm on account of failing health. Robert Ashley has rented his farm and moved onto it.

Selby.

[Correspondence of THE EXPRESS.]

—W. E. Hazard, Esq., has moved into his lately purchased dwelling, the former M. E. parsonage.

—Mr. Warren Hunt will return to Selby to reside in a few days.

—Mr. Jas. Gonu is erecting a new house north of the village. He is now absent in the northern townships, hunting and fishing.

—Mr. Jas. Wells and Mr. Alva Hazard moved last week to Huron Co., Michigan. Mr. R. J. Hazard moved more than a year ago. They have all purchased land there and expect to reside in that place permanently.

—The Council have taken possession of the brick church, which is henceforth the Town Hall.

—His Honor Judge Wilkison was out last Monday at the instance of the Reformers of Richmond to revise the voters' list. They made a gain of 15.

—Rev. R. N. Adams preached in the Methodist church last Sabbath morning.

—A young men of our village took unto himself a "better half" last Thursday evening, and to judge from appearances, more will follow his example ere long.

the winter.

—Cupid has been at work, and the first result of his labors in this vicinity was the capture of of Mr. John Hunt, of Hungerford, by one of the fairest and most amiable maidens in that section, Miss Annie Gaffney. The ceremony was performed by the Rev. Father Hogan on Monday last. The bride was richly attired in seal brown silk and looked lovely. About two hundred and fifty guests were present and beautiful gifts were numerous. They have the best wishes of a large circle of friends for their future felicity.

—Mrs. Blewett and daughter have gone to New York. Libbie intends spending a year in the Convent of the Sacred Heart.

—Richard O'Neill left on Monday, 13th inst., for Michigan.

—Mr. and Mrs. Lessard and daughter, of Flinton, were the guests of Mr. M. S. Murphy, on Sunday last.

—R. J. Murphy has returned from Watertown. He is quite a Yankee.

—We are happy to state that Miss M Murphy, jr, is recovering from her recent illness.

NIMROD.

Stella—Amherst Island.

[Correspondence of THE EXPRESS.]

—Our fair is all over once more but last night one would have thought that the "Donnybrook Fair" was being held at Stella, where whisky, cudgels and oaths were all mixed up, two-thirds oaths and one-third fight. No sore heads but many sick stomachs to-day.

—We had the pleasure of seeing Mr. G. E. Staley, of Kingston, amongst the guests at the Tichborne to-night. I believe he is going to start a dancing class at Amherst Island for the fall and winter months, the first meeting to be held on Tuesday, Oct. 23, in the Town Hall, Stella, when a committee will be formed to conduct the meetings in proper order. We hope he may succeed.

—The next thing our farmers are going to institute at Stella is a ploughing match, for which $10 has already been subscribed. This is something that is greatly needed here to give the young men an interest in ploughing, as there are too many who think the one who can turn over the most ground in a day is the best plougher going.

—It is certainly very gratifying to Mr. Wm. McDonald to know that the "Black Hawk" and his stock are the winners of so many prizes, and they are deserving of it, for he is a very pretty horse.

—What we want in this township is a good constable. The fruit and vegetables taken to our shows are devoured by a mob of young rascals before the owners can even get in to see if they have got prizes or not.

—We are sorry to hear that Mr. James S. Neilson is very sick. We hope he may soon be around tending to his business as usual.

—The Emerald correspondent says the "Belle of Stella" has not accepted the challenge of the "Amherst Belle." He or she need not get in a flurry about it. I do not doubt but the latter would come out ahead in a light wind, but I do know this, that the "Belle of Stella" can cross the bay when the other dare not.

—The great question now is, does the dairy or butter-making pay the farmer the best. Some say the one and some say the other, but the most experienced ones decide that the dairy is ahead.

—Mr. Hugh Wright has left us again for his home at Chalk River, on the C. P. R. He gives very glowing accounts of that great structure that is to reach from ocean to ocean.

—We were glad to see Mr. O'Beirne, of THE EXPRESS, a visitor among the many who were at our fair. It shows that Amherst Island is not such an isolated place after all and that our stock has a name all through the county.

QUIXOTE.

(The above arrived too late for last week.)

—Not much news this week but still a few items of interest to some.

—I have been informed that Mr. C. F. Howard carried off more prizes at our township show than any other and indeed, more than he was entitled to; out of eighteen entries he received nineteen prizes. He must have got one of mine.

—There were ten residents of Stella summoned to appear at the election trial to come off next month. One party summoned had it explained to him that the reason was, he had a pickle bottle hidden somewhere the day of the election, with something in it stronger than tea, but he is willing to swear it wasn't a pickle bottle but held a pint and a half, imperial measure.

—We had the pleasure of meeting D. W. Allison, M. P., on the Hero on Tuesday evening 18th inst.

—Mr. J. S. Neilson is improving slowly but surely.

—Notwithstanding the inclement weather Capt. Craig is always on hand with his little Hero.

—Barley only fifty cents per bushel and many Scott Act men are beginning to have their doubts about the temperance question.

BASE BALL.—A match game of base ball was played in North Fredericksburg on Saturday last between the White Oaks of Hay Bay and the Royals of North Frederickubgrgh, resulting in a victory for the former club. The following is the score:—

WHITE OAKS.	R	O	ROYALS.	R	O
D. Perry	4	3	C. Hawley	2	3
N. Post	2	5	L. Dafoe	2	2
T. Hambly	3	3	A. Parks	0	5

A. McCabe	4	1	A. Dafoe	2	4
W. Hambly	3	3	H. Galt	3	1
D. DeCabe	3	3	W. Sharp	1	5

Score by innings:—

White Oaks—	1	0	8	5	3	2	0	2	10	—31
Royals—	1	3	0	3	2	3	0	2	3	—17

There was some fine playing done on both sides, considering the rough ground. The game was umpired by G. W. McCabe, whose fair and impartial decisions gave entire satisfaction. This is the first time these clubs ever met and the result puts another feather in the caps of the White Oaks.

Bath.

[Correspondence of THE EXPRESS.]

THE BOOM IN REAL ESTATE.—Mr. Geo. Cook, of Parrot's Bay has purchased the residence of Mr. Isaac Asselstine on First Street. He will rebuild and beautify the premises at once, as it is his intention of taking immediate possession.

—Mr. M. H. Grass was in town on Tuesday, ostensibly for the purpose of securing a lot from Mr. C. L. Rogers, on Main Street, for his father, who is seeking retirement from business.

—Mr. Peter Clark Aitkens, of Collinsby, intends settling at Bath if he can get a lot to suit him. He has recently sold his farm to Mr. Marsh, the proprietor of Marsh's hotel on the Bath road.

—Mr. Joseph Deunee has retired into winter quarters with his son-in-law, Mr. John Murdoch, and will not purchase until next spring.

—Mr. John Morrow was in town on Tuesday and promised to make improvements in his property here.

—Mr. D. W. Ball will not build until next spring, preferring to board during the winter.

—Mr. Edwards will soon commence operations for his new summer boarding house.

—Mr. E. Burley and Mr. D. McBride have recently made permanent improvements in their property.

—The city fathers have consented to an 80-inch plank-walk for Main Street.

—Frank VanLuven has resigned his position as station master here. Too much close confinement.

—Mrs. L. Wagar has made improvements in her property and intends settling here for the winter.

—Mr. W. Keech deserves credit for the tidy appearance he has given his house.

—What a surprise those gentlemen did give us. We did not expect them so soon. The next time they call we will have the gate on hinges.

—J. Boyce, while sailing up the river to a portion of his farm, had a trolling line out. He soon had a bite which gave him a quick jerk, and he had to put forth all his strength to haul in the line, at the end of which was a large pike which he got safely in the boat. It weighed 13 lbs. Some sports would have given him whatever he asked for it but he thought he would have the pleasure of enjoying it himself.

—Miss Minnie Phalen has returned from her sojourn in the States. She says that she likes Canada best.

—Bid Clarke is preparing to go back hunting; we may expect lots of deer.

—Mr. Lakins has commenced building a new barn. A pleasant time was spent at the raising, the string band being present to enliven the scene.

—Elias Garrison is making improvements by raising his house and building a cellar; he is also making an addition to the house, which will be comfortabe when finished.

—Isaac Smith has re-moddled his house, which greatly adds to its appearance.

—William Kerr is enlarging his dwelling which he finds necessary to meets the requirements of his increasing family.

—Richard Lilley has nearly completed the improvements on his barn; when finished he will have a comfortable place.

[Correspondence of THE EXPRESS.]

—Mr. Henry Brown, brother-in-law of Miss Jackson of Napanee, has just returned from British Columbia, and expresses himself highly delighted with the prospects that province presents to the industrious working man and to the new settler desirous of securing a good home. Mr. Brown's present purpose is to return with his family in the spring and settle in that province.

—Mr. Lake, of Ernesttown, is getting material together to construct the weigh scales for his coal yard, and he intends to prosecute his business vigorously greatly to the advantage of the village and vicinity, as our coal supply has hitherto been drawn either from Belleville or Deseronto.

—Mr. W. L. Roberts, son-in-law of the Rev. Mr. Baker, of Deseronto, has just returned with his blooming young bride from a protracted bridal tour to New York, and after spending a day with his parents here, proceeded to his western home with many wishes for future happiness and prosperity.

—Harvest thanksgiving services were held in Trinity Church here on Sabbath last. The church was beautifully decorated for the occasion and the offerings were abundant and liberal. In the scarcity of money such offerings from the abundance of the land should gladden the heart of the faithful pastor and acceptably replenish his larder. At the evening service, in the absence of the pastor, Mr. Kemp, station agent here, conducted the service, and read one of Wesley's sermons, greatly to the edification and delight of the congregation.

—The revival services in the Methodist Church, Melrose, continue from night to night with unabated interest and power.

Ernesttown Station.

[Correspondence of THE EXPRESS.]

—As far as THE EXPRESS is concerned, Ernesttown might as well be located in the wilds of Siberia, inhabited only by the unfortunate victims of the autocrat of Russia, or an oasis in the desert of Sahara, the resort of an occasional band of camel drivers. Why don't you drum up some live correspondent to tell you what is going on, who is going to be married, how many fair and cloudy days we have during the week, how far behind time the trains are and all such matters of importance conducive to the welfare of the public?

—I say, can you tell who pays the "beaver" for trying to "bear" the barley market every year? That course is getting just about as stale as it is uncalled for, and the fact of such being the hapter II.

"Departed spirits of the mighty dead."

Winging swift their silent way through the buoyant morning air
Spirits of dead poets came, gathering from everywhere,
Almost every land and clime represented in the host
Of the present time's progress and their own live deeds to boast.
A convention of those minds whose works many praises bring Gathered all, and lo we find English Shakespeare is their king!
Glad of this occasion then, let us listen while they give
What they've seen and heard and think of the present race that live.
Many subjects they discuss—Tariff, Gordon and the East;
Shakespeare, rising, "brethren," says "these are all to me the least."

"Yesterday, in a paper, I by chance
Saw laid before me, and with rapid glance
Read o'er the page and saw my own name there,
(Then on a-down with still increasing care)
But not surprised was I at this, for still My fame is bright, and linger ever will Both name and fame; that's neither here nor there,
What I at present mean to you lay bare
Is what I read; be patient while I give You a synopsis of it: As I live
'Twas of two villages, they lying near
Have dispute had ('tis so from year to year)
On the location of a station, see;
One says, give all, the other, half to me.
One is called Ben, the other one is Jim;
Ben wants it all; but Jim just man, to him
A half's enough; but when his brother Ben
(Greedily fatent to gain his aim and end)
Determined is to take his right away
He in defence of right has said his say,
To which true bill Ben, much incensed, replies
And that's the matter which my temper tries.
You mind the trial scene in the Venice court,
Shylock, Portia, Bassanio and in short
All the rest. Well he, this Ben, I mean,
Drags to his pen the all-absorbing scene,
Paints Jim as Shylock—the idiot; heard you e'er
Such senseless stuff; I solemnly aver
There's no comparison—not the smallest part,
'Twixt he and Jim, for Shylock's murderous heart
Dark and revengeful craved a Christian life.
Jim only claims what's his, a Christian right—
Simply his share, just this and nothing more—
In this same station, as I've said before.
Corrupt, indeed, and bought, such words as these,
No wonder flow with such apparent ease,
How well you see does he, the answering scribe,
Mete, by himself, the others powers to bribe.
Full well he knows the judge would, if "not bound"
With anger just on Ben himself come down.
Let those judge who know—I've watched the scene throughout—
My mind of Ben I'll tell you more about:
Ben in his greed, his Jew-like covetuousness
Is Shylock's compeer, and I must confess
Were I on earth to-day wield the quill again
A portrait paint like Shylock of this Ben.
Or worse, I would of schemes, intrigues and shaves,
To put it all in one plain word, 'tis knaves.
You oft have seen the crawling worm fast hold
Take to some solid, then about him fold
His spotted coat, when lo! as days pass by Comes from this case a gaudy butterfly,
Which in the summer sun and balmy day
Makes but a show and passes life away;
Or compared better to that tempting fruit,
To the eye seeming sure the taste to suit,
Hastening to gather when lo! what surprise
Gone all the beauty, ashes meet the eyes.
So Ben you touch and strip his covering off
Rot to the core and that, to jeer and scoff
Which, as a duty, for no compeer ever
Did half the meanness that is hidden there.
Is it their food? That may have some to do;
Their well spoke beef is like them rotten too

us. [illegible] we did not expect them so soon. The next time they call we will have the gate on hinges.

—"Opposition is the life of trade." It will work with sewing machines as well as sugars. Report says that there is to be a new agent for machines here, while our merchants are already giving as much sugar for a dollar bill as is advertised in your town. Nothing like it.

—Our villagers some time ago subscribed and paid for a sett of hay scales which were to have been placed in working order before this. We are in great need of the scales and some parties talk very strongly of learning "why not?"

The report that our mail after the 1st prox. will come by the N. T. & Q. Railway, was received with satisfaction here. Three mails daily means fun for the boys but death to the postmasters.

– I would like to find the man who stole that hat and put the green tomatoes in my bed. If I catch him he will wish he had never struck on the other side of that gate alive.

Oh! Doctor, don't deceive the parson again by making him think he has a vote.

—Mrs. J. S. Miller has just returned from Morven where she has been spending a week visiting friends.

—The many friends of Mrs. Washburn McCrady will be sorry to hear that her health is not improved any since her return to Prince Edward.

—Rev. M. J. Bates, of Yarker, our former pastor, was around calling on his old friends. All were very much pleased to see him, especially the young ladies.

—The smiling visage of Mr. Alonzo Ash is once more seen around town.

—Two of Tamworth's young ladies spent last week in Centreville. A Manitoba young man very unexpectedly appeared on the scene and astonished the natives by carrying off the Belle.

—Our annual missionary meeting came off on Tuesday, 14th inst., and was a grand success, both financially and oratorically, the principal speakers being Revds. Bates, of Yarker; Robinson, of Wilton; and Faul, of Centreville.

—Mr. B. G. Secord, one of the numerous and persuasive book agents with which this village abounds, left last Monday for "fresh fields and pastures new," after a sojourn of about four months here. The only consolation the girls have is that he has not gone any further away than Tamworth and will, doubtless, be able to get back once in a while. URIAH HEEP.

HUNTING PARTIES.—Up to the latest accounts the Dulmage hunting party, from Belleville, had killed eleven deer and caught two barrels of salmon, together with a large number of partridges bagged.... Mr. Lester Scott and brother, of Napanee, accompanied by W. Snider, of Belleville, and Mr. Smith, of Napanee, passed on the 17th inst. to the hunting grounds in the vicinity of Plevna. They expect to have a three weeks' outing.... Mr. John Soby, after spending a week with the Perry-Wheeler hunting party and getting two deer, returned home on the 16th inst.... Mr. James O'Brien, son and adopted son, Mr. W. M. Huff came on the 20th inst. and are operating at Wolf Lake. Up to time of writing they had killed ten deer and a number of partridges and succeeded in taking some excellent fish.... The Napanee party who operated near Loon Lake, composed of Messrs. Miller, Pruyn, Perry, Wray and Demorest, who came on the 9th inst., were fortunate enough to slay eight deer. All were pleased with the sport. Singularly enough, the honor of doing the "crack shooting" was accorded to a "green horn" among the party. The party returned to Napanee on Monday, laden with their spoils, rejoicing. Owing to urgent business Mr. A. P. Wickware was unable to attend, only on certain days.... Mr. Peter Amy and hunting party, of Bath, arrived on the 16th and proceeded with their annual hunt.... Messrs. L. A. Wheeler, E. H. Perry, of Centreville, B. Perry, Tamworth, and David Perry, of Ernesttown, arrived on the 18th inst. on a hunting expedition. Owing to urgent business the Messrs. Perry were obliged to return on the 18th inst.

Being in a partly recumbent position, the ball passed in close proximity to his body, from the hips upward, tearing his clothes, splitting his ear and making a hole in his hat close to the band.

—Mr. Harry Coyle, of Napanee, returns in a few days and intends to remain here for the winter.

—Messrs. Wm. and Thos. Dempsey and Ed. Hall, returned from Saginaw, Mich., on the 18th inst. After an experience of twelve months they report business in many lines very dull.

—I say, can you tell why [illegible] Beaver for trying to "bear" the barley market every year? That course is getting just about as stale as it is uncalled for, and the fact of such being the policy of that journal from year to year, not only this year but every year, is leading some to believe that its motive is not wholly disinterested. The very fact of the barley market being subject to such extreme fluctuations ought to be enough to convince anyone of common sense of the childish absurdity of attempting to forecast the price with any degree of certainty. All last fall and winter the Beaver was loud-mouthed in crying down the price of barley. There was absolutely no chance of a rise and it was figured folly to hold in that expectation. What followed? Those farmers who were fortunate enough to hold were rewarded by a sharp advance of from 10 to 15 cents per bushel before the close of the malting season. The result may or may not be the same this year, but let every farmer use his own judgment and sell his barley when he gets ready and not be influenced by any grain dealer or any journal working in the dealers' interest. According to figures furnished by the Ontario Government, Canada will export less barley this year than in '83 and very much less than in '82. All authorities agree that the crop in New York State is considerably below the average, and it should be remembered that New York and California produce a very large percentage of the entire crop of the United States. In this connection and another subject of vital importance to the barley growers, more anon. BEE.

—The Council met on Monday night, the Reeve in the chair. Present, Messrs. Bell, Finkle and Farley. After routine it was moved by Mr. Finkle and seconded by Mr. Bell, that the Collector be paid $40 for collecting the taxes to the amount of $2,600 and upon all over that amount 2 per cent.—Carried.

—Mr. Geo. Stickney left for New Orleans on Monday morning. Before leaving he made Mr. James Holmes a handsome present of a watch worth $50. We wish George a safe journey for he is a fine fellow.

—Mr. John Farley is building a nice barn and stable.

—The anniversary of the Methodist Sabbath School was a great financial success. The Rev. Mr. Depew of Tamworth delivered two excellent sermons on Sunday and an able discourse on the Monday evening following. Somewhat more than $27 were realized.

—The Methodist Church fence is receiving an extra coat of paint.

—Mr. H. Finkle is levelling off a piece of land. We understand he intends building a brick house.

—The sidewalk is undergoing repairs in front of Mr. Miles Caton's store.

—We are pleased to learn that two more of our high school pupils have received certificates and that Miss Ida Rook has been raised from an intermediate to a third-class standing. This speaks volumes for our teachers. A few weeks ago we asked "Where is the high school that has done better?" We have not yet learned the name of any. We have now to add that our school passed more than ninety-four per cent. of those who were pupils for the current year, and this we believe is the largest per centage of pupils passed by any high school or collegiate institute in Ontario. Newburgh high school has always occupied a foremost place and we are proud to see it taking the lead of many schools situated in cities and large towns. Already the pupils from the county far outnumber those from the villiage and it is to be hoped that the county will bear a proportionate share of the expense of supporting an institution that is doing a noble work for the county and for the rising generation.

—Mr. Burrows, Public School Inspector, paid our schools a visit on Monday. We have not yet learned what his report is of the proficiency of our public school pupils.... Mr. R. H. Tisdale has been quite ill.

—The annual meeting of the American canoe association will be held next year on Grindstone Island, opposite Gananoque, the same place as last year.

—The County of Prince Edward exhibition will in future be held on the second Wednesday and Thursday in October. The attention of the directors of the Lennox county society is directed to the fact.

—Hon. T. V. Powderly, of Scranton, Pa., general master workman of the Knights of Labor, of America, visited Belleville on Tuesday last and delivered a lecture on the aims and objects of the association.

AGRICULTURAL.

Garden Notes.

The month of October is the time for harvesting roots, the fine dry days make pleasant work of it if done in season, but if put off till the colder and wetter weather of November, the men can not accomplish nearly as much work as they can in the pleasant days of this month Beets are harvested first as they are more likely to be damaged by frost than carrots or turnips, which are taken care of later. Parsnips also if wanted for sale in winter, or very early in spring, must be harvested in autumn, though if wanted for use after the ground thaws, they usually keep better in the field undisturbed; the same is true of horseradish.

The best way to keep all kinds of roots is in pits, but if put into a cellar they should be piled not over two or three feet deep, and covered over with a little hay or straw to keep the air from wilting them. The cellar for roots is best kept quite cold, almost freezing, and in case the roots begin to heat, they must be overhauled at once to cool them off; turnips are more likely to heat than other roots, and should not be piled more than two feet deep, and even then will need care to keep them from heating.

Beets and mangolds are pulled by hand and thrown in heaps and topped in the field; carrots and parsnips are pulled quite easily after ploughing a deep furrow quite close to the off side of the row; horseradish needs to be ploughed on both sides of the row, throwing the earth from the roots, and then with a good team and a good ploughman the plough can be run directly under the roots, turning them completely out; it is severe work for both horses and man. The horseradish tops should be cleaned off with hoes and rakes before ploughing out; this is best done quite late, about Nov. 10, for the roots keep growing later than others.

All celery should now be banked up without delay, for there is no danger of rotting in the cool weather. That which is intended for late keeping should be banked last and only banked once, just enough to crowd the leaves together, so that it will pack well in the pit.

Parsley and dandelion roots may be transplanted still for forcing in cold frames, though the work is better done in September. Lettuce plants should have a little heat if transplanted this month, and those in cold beds will need care to keep the frost out in cold, windy nights. Lettuce in greenhouses will usually need a little fire on cold nights before November, but in fine weather the glass will need abundant airing.

October is a good time to gather in a good stock of forest leaves; they are capital covering for keeping frost out of cabbage beds, celery pits, and all sorts of pits in fact, and when plenty may be used for litter with advantage.

During all my experience I never remember seeing so long continued a glut of tomatoes; it is not uncommon to have them sell for a single day or two for less than the cost of picking and selling them, but this year the glut has held out for nearly a month, at prices considerably less than the cost of gathering and carting to market. but this year the glut has held out for nearly a month, at prices considerably less than the cost of gathering and carting to market. The pickling establishments have had everything their own way this year, and if they have not laid in a large stock they can only blame themselves. These extremely low prices might perhaps be avoided in the future, if the gardeners had the good sense and spirit to combine in a trade union, as other trades do, and limit their production to the wants of the market. If the coal miners, for instance, were to work all their machinery to its full capacity, they would produce nearly twice as much coal as is needed, and the price would be ruinously low; they combine and agree to limit production. The result is a healthy demand and a reasonable price. The glut is a natural result of the high prices of two and three years ago, when extensive droughts at the south limited the crop, making prices very profitable here, where the crop was fairly good. Farmers began to think that the pickle factories would always pay 75c or $1 per bushel for good tomatoes, and this year the amount of land planted was probably double the average. Late frosts in June and a wet season damaged the plants and made the crop ripen later, but in September the yield was enormous, and thousands of bushels have rotted in the fields forwant of market. The loss falls heavily on many farmers who have depended on this crop for a pretty sure source of income.—[N. E. Farmer.

A Gold and Silver Street

Our principal streets are receiving a top-dressing of rock from the waste dumps to put them in order for the coming winter. Very frequently during the summer pieces of good ore have been picked out from among that dumped in the roadway by the carts, but recently it was evident that a new waste dump had been attacked, as there was an unusual preponderance of ore in the material. It seemed, in fact, to be nearly all ore. Close examination, however, showed that a considerable amount of what at the first glance seomed good ore was very base, yet with this base was mingled much rich black sulphuret ore.

From a lot of this dumped on C street, in front of Odd-Fellows' hall, we took two samples, which were crushed up together and assayed by J. R. Ryan, of the Consolidated Virginia assay office, with the following results: Gold, $164.75; silver, $168; total, $332.75.

This is pretty good "waste rock" with which to filll in the streets! We induce a mill man of Silver city to examine the rock that was being dumped from the street carts. At first he thought it all base, but on looking more carefully he began to find lumps of genuine black sulphuret ore, and finally said: "This is better material than most of that now being taken out on the old upper levels. It would pay well for working."

The assay given above was made after this, and the opinion obtained from the millman was founded wholly on what he saw before him. It is said that the rock of which we are speaking is obtained at a waste dump up near the corner of A and Carson streets. The rock was probably brought out of the old Burning Moscow in the early days. Miners were not then good judges of ore. Some portions of the vein having been assayed and found to be base, it was probably concluded that all was base, as only a practised eye would note the difference of grain. Wherever the rock may have been mined, it is evident that it would pay pretty well to over haul that waste dump. By careful assorting, no doubt a large amount of good ore might easily be obtained.—[Virginia City (Nev.) Enterprise.

Raising of Stock.

From the report of the select committee appointed by the House of Commons to obtain information as to the agricultural interests of the country, we cull the following remarks which appear in a communication made b Professor Wm. Brown. The Professor says:

"As a people, we live on flour, flesh and fruit, and if flesh be second to flour in importance, it is now, at any rate in the older provinces, the back bone of flour. What can we do to make our farmers realize the difference between breeds—between pure breds and grades—and that Canada all over is a splendid field for their most perfect and economical development? The subject has two aspects: The production of thoroughbreds for ourselves and the American market, and of grades partly for themselves and largely for the British market. I may be too warm on these to give what may be deemed an impartial opinion, for I have always contended that as Canadians we have not yet realized how much we can do as a country in these particulars.

No part of the American continent can compete with us in the healthy maintenance of cattle and sheep, and were our farmers alive at the present moment to what is going on in the United States as preparatory to an almost universal bonanza in beef and mutton, they would surely wake up—for I do not think we want for enterprise—once realized. I see no reason why Canada should not place and hold herself as the sole breeding ground for the United States. The Americans themselves think so. They act upon this belief and yet we do not seem to see it."

Artificial Manures.

The tendency of every country as it increases inpopulation should be toward closer and more economical tillage. In a very short time Ontario and Quebec farmers will have to compete with those of the Northwest, whose farms cost them next to nothing, and who till a soil of well nigh inexhaustible richness. If they would wish to hold their own in this age of keen and vigorous competition, the Ontario farmers must make the most of their resources. Their land is, much of it, partially worn out, but on the other hand labor is cheaper in Ontario than in the North-west, and though her soil may not be particularly fertile in its present state, the country abounds in fertilizers that can be readily made available. It is a well known fact that mineral phosphates abound in various portions of Ontario and Quebec, notably in the counties of Frontenac and Lanark and in the Ottawa Valley. This phosphate has in times past been shipped in large quantities out of the country, but it is to be hoped that

A MARVELOUS STORY

TOLD IN TWO LETTERS.

FROM THE SON: "28 Cedar St., New York, Oct. 28, 1882.

"Gentlemen: My father resides at Glover, Vt. He has been a great sufferer from Scrofula, and the inclosed letter will tell you what a marvelous effect has had in his case. I think his blood must have contained the humor for at least ten years; but it did not show, except in the form of a scrofulous sore on the wrist, until about five years ago. From a few spots which appeared at that time, it gradually spread so as to cover his entire body. I assure you he was terribly afflicted, and an object of pity, when he began using your medicine. Now, there are few men of his age who enjoy as good health as he has. I could easily name fifty persons who would testify to the facts in his case.

Yours truly, W. M. PHILLIPS."

FROM THE FATHER: "It is both a pleasure and a duty for me to state to you the benefit I have derived from the use of

Ayer's Sarsaparilla.

Six months ago I was completely covered with a terrible humor and scrofulous sores. The humor caused an incessant and intolerable itching, and the skin cracked so as to cause the blood to flow in many places whenever I moved. My sufferings were great, and my life a burden. I commenced the use of the SARSAPARILLA in April last, and have used it regularly since that time. My condition began to improve at once. The sores have all healed, and I feel perfectly well in every respect—being now able to do a good day's work, although 73 years of age. Many inquire what has wrought such a cure in my case, and I tell them, as I have here tried to tell you, AYER'S SARSAPARILLA. Glover, Vt., Oct. 21, 1882. Yours gratefully,

HIRAM PHILLIPS."

AYER'S SARSAPARILLA cures Scrofula and all Scrofulous Complaints, Erysipelas, Eczema, Ringworm, Blotches, Sores, Boils, Tumors, and Eruptions of the Skin. It clears the blood of all impurities, aids digestion, stimulates the action of the bowels, and thus restores vitality and strengthens the whole system.

ley. This phosphate has in times past been shipped in large quantities out of the country, but it is to be hoped that the time for this sort of thing will soon be at an end. Canada cannot afford to ship her phosphates to England, and the sooner she finds this out the better. The immense accumulations of offal and refuse about the great cities ought to be utilized in the production of fertilizers, and these with the mineral phosphates should be sufficient to enrich, for generations to come, all the worn out land in the older provinces. At present the phosphate is exported and the offal is wasted, but sooner or later all this must be changed. —[Canadian Breeder.

A Startling Potatoe Yield

The editor of the Rural New Yorker reports a yield of potatoes upon its experiment grounds of 1391½ bushels per acre. They were dug Aug. 27, weighed, and the yield per acre figured out by disinterested parties. We are not informed as to the size of the field, nor much about the method of culture. This is at the rate of 8 bushels and 41 pounds per square rod. With rows two and three-fourths feet apart (33 inches), there would be six rows to the rod. The above yield would give five pecks and nearly seven pounds to each row one rod long. With the hills sixteen and a half inches apart, there would be twelve hills to the row, and almost seven pounds per hill, or a small fraction less than a half peck. There is plenty of room on an acre of land to bury 1390 bushels of potatoes, but not many farmers have yet learned how to coax that quantity to grow upon so small an area. It is worth something to know that it can be done. Four hundred and eighty-eight bushels was our largest yield of this crop, estimated from the product of one square rod. We are anxious to try again and intend to do so.—[N. E. Farmer.

The Cork Duck.

A pleasant trick to look at was the one which followed. He took a cocoanut shell with one end cut off, and filled it with water. In the water he placed a little piece of cork, having a bent pin on one side, and two straignt pins on the other side, so that the cork as it floated roughly resembled a lilliputian duck. The cork lay dead in the water, and it was difficult to think what magic could possibly be got out of it. Presently the juggler, sitting about two yards off, took out a musical instrument and began to play a lively tune. Instantly the imitation duck commenced to dance violently in the water, suiting its motions to the music. The dancing continued till the tune was ended; then the juggler ordered the duck to salaam, and he was at once obeyed. He even requested the buoyant cork to dive to the bottom of the water, and his request was immediately complied with. While the performance was going on the cocoanut shell was standing almost at our feet, and the performer was not only sitting beyond reach, but both his hands were employed in playing the instrument.—[Chamber's Journal.

Garden Notes.

The month of October is the time for harvesting roots, the fine dry days make pleasant work of it if done in season, but if put off till the colder and wetter weather of November, the men can not accomplish nearly as much work as they can in the pleasant days of this month Beets are harvested first as they are more likely to be damaged by frost than carrots or turnips, which are taken care of later. Parsnips also if wanted for sale in winter, or very early in spring, must be harvested in autumn, though if wanted for use after the ground thaws, they usually keep better in the field undisturbed; the same is true of horseradish.

The best way to keep all kinds of roots is in pits, but if put into a cellar they should be piled not over two or three feet deep, and covered over with a little hay or straw to keep the air from wilting them. The cellar for roots is best kept quite cold, almost freezing, and in case the roots begin to heat, they must be overhauled at once to cool them off; turnips are more likely to heat than other roots, and should not be piled more than two feet deep, and even then will need care to keep them from heating.

Beets and mangolds are pulled by hand and thrown in heaps and topped in the field; carrots and parsnips are pulled quite easily after ploughing a deep furrow quite close to the off side of the row; horseradish needs to be ploughed on both sides of the row, throwing the earth from the roots, and then with a good team and a good ploughman the plough can be run directly under the roots, turning them completely out; it is severe work for both horses and man. The horseradish tops should be cleaned off with hoes and rakes before ploughing out; this is best done quite late, about Nov. 10, for the roots keep growing later than others.

All celery should now be banked up without delay, for there is no danger of rotting in the cool weather. That which is intended for late keeping should be banked last and only banked once, just enough to crowd the leaves together, so that it will pack well in the pit.

Parsley and dandelion roots may be transplanted still for forcing in cold frames, though the work is better done in September. Lettuce plants should have a little heat if transplanted this month, and those in cold beds will need care to keep the frost out in cold, windy nights. Lettuce in greenhouses will usually need a little fire on cold nights before November, but in fine weather the glass will need abundant airing.

October is a good time to gather in a good stock of forest leaves; they are capital covering for keeping frost out of cabbage beds, celery pits, and all sorts of pits in fact, and when plenty may be used for litter with advantage.

During all my experience I never remember seeing so long continued a glut of tomatoes; it is not uncommon to have them sell for a single day or two for less than the cost of picking and selling them, but this year the glut has held out for nearly a month, at prices considerably less than the cost of gathering and carting to market. but this year the glut has held out for nearly a month, at prices considerably less than the cost of gathering and carting to market. The pickling establishments have had everything their own way this year, and if they have not laid in a large stock they can only blame themselves. These extremely low prices might perhaps be avoided in the future, if the gardeners had the good sense and spirit to combine in a trade union, as other trades do, and limit their production to the wants of the market. If the coal miners, for instance, were to work all their machinery to its full capacity, they would produce nearly twice as much coal as is needed, and the price would be ruinously low; they combine and agree to limit production. The result is a healthy demand and a reasonable price. The glut is a natural result of the high prices of two and three years ago, when extensive droughts at the south limited the crop, making prices very profitable here, where the crop was fairly good. Farmers began to think that the pickle factories would always pay 75c or $1 per bushel for good tomatoes, and this year the amount of land planted was probably double the average. Late frosts in June and a wet season damaged the plants and made the crop ripen later, but in September the yield was enormous, and thousands of bushels have rotted in the fields forwant of market. The loss falls heavily on many farmers who have depended on this crop for a pretty sure source of income.—[N. E. Farmer.

A Gold and Silver Street

Our principal streets are receiving a top-dressing of rock from the waste dumps to put them in order for the coming winter. Very frequently during the summer pieces of good ore have been picked out from among that dumped in the roadway by the carts, but recently it was evident that a new waste dump had been attacked, as there was an unusual preponderance of ore in the material. It seemed, in fact, to be nearly all ore. Close examination, however, showed that a considerable amount of what at the first glance seomed good ore was very base, yet with this base was mingled much rich black sulphuret ore.

From a lot of this dumped on C street, in front of Odd-Fellows' hall, we took two samples, which were crushed up together and assayed by J. R. Ryan, of the Consolidated Virginia assay office, with the following results: Gold, $164.75; silver, $168; total, $332.75.

This is pretty good "waste rock" with which to filll in the streets! We induce a mill man of Silver city to examine the rock that was being dumped from the street carts. At first he thought it all base, but on looking more carefully he began to find lumps of genuine black sulphuret ore, and finally said: "This is better material than most of that now being taken out on the old upper levels. It would pay well for working."

The assay given above was made after this, and the opinion obtained from the millman was founded wholly on what he saw before him. It is said that the rock of which we are speaking is obtained at a waste dump up near the corner of A and Carson streets. The rock was probably brought out of the old Burning Moscow in the early days. Miners were not then good judges of ore. Some portions of the vein having been assayed and found to be base, it was probably concluded that all was base, as only a practised eye would note the difference of grain. Wherever the rock may have been mined, it is evident that it would pay pretty well to over haul that waste dump. By careful assorting, no doubt a large amount of good ore might easily be obtained.—[Virginia City (Nev.) Enterprise.

Raising of Stock.

From the report of the select committee appointed by the House of Commons to obtain information as to the agricultural interests of the country, we cull the following remarks which appear in a communication made b Professor Wm. Brown. The Professor says:

"As a people, we live on flour, flesh and fruit, and if flesh be second to flour in importance, it is now, at any rate in the older provinces, the back bone of flour. What can we do to make our farmers realize the difference between breeds—between pure breds and grades—and that Canada all over is a splendid field for their most perfect and economical development? The subject has two aspects: The production of thoroughbreds for ourselves and the American market, and of grades partly for themselves and largely for the British market. I may be too warm on these to give what may be deemed an impartial opinion, for I have always contended that as Canadians we have not yet realized how much we can do as a country in these particulars.

No part of the American continent can compete with us in the healthy maintenance of cattle and sheep, and were our farmers alive at the present moment to what is going on in the United States as preparatory to an almost universal bonanza in beef and mutton, they would surely wake up—for I do not think we want for enterprise—once realized. I see no reason why Canada should not place and hold herself as the sole breeding ground for the United States. The Americans themselves think so. They act upon this belief and yet we do not seem to see it."

Artificial Manures.

The tendency of every country as it increases inpopulation should be toward closer and more economical tillage. In a very short time Ontario and Quebec farmers will have to compete with those of the Northwest, whose farms cost them next to nothing, and who till a soil of well nigh inexhaustible richness. If they would wish to hold their own in this age of keen and vigorous competition, the Ontario farmers must make the most of their resources. Their land is, much of it, partially worn out, but on the other hand labor is cheaper in Ontario than in the North-west, and though her soil may not be particularly fertile in its present state, the country abounds in fertilizers that can be readily made available. It is a well known fact that mineral phosphates abound in various portions of Ontario and Quebec, notably in the counties of Frontenac and Lanark and in the Ottawa Valley. This phosphate has in times past been shipped in large quantities out of the country, but it is to be hoped that

A MARVELOUS STORY

TOLD IN TWO LETTERS.

FROM THE SON: "28 Cedar St., New York, Oct. 28, 1882.

"Gentlemen: My father resides at Glover, Vt. He has been a great sufferer from Scrofula, and the inclosed letter will tell you what a marvelous effect has had in his case. I think his blood must have contained the humor for at least ten years; but it did not show, except in the form of a scrofulous sore on the wrist, until about five years ago. From a few spots which appeared at that time, it gradually spread so as to cover his entire body. I assure you he was terribly afflicted, and an object of pity, when he began using your medicine. Now, there are few men of his age who enjoy as good health as he has. I could easily name fifty persons who would testify to the facts in his case.

Yours truly, W. M. PHILLIPS."

FROM THE FATHER: "It is both a pleasure and a duty for me to state to you the benefit I have derived from the use of

Ayer's Sarsaparilla.

Six months ago I was completely covered with a terrible humor and scrofulous sores. The humor caused an incessant and intolerable itching, and the skin cracked so as to cause the blood to flow in many places whenever I moved. My sufferings were great, and my life a burden. I commenced the use of the SARSAPARILLA in April last, and have used it regularly since that time. My condition began to improve at once. The sores have all healed, and I feel perfectly well in every respect—being now able to do a good day's work, although 73 years of age. Many inquire what has wrought such a cure in my case, and I tell them, as I have here tried to tell you, AYER'S SARSAPARILLA. Glover, Vt., Oct. 21, 1882. Yours gratefully, been shipped in large quantities out of the country, but it is to be hoped that the time for this sort of thing will soon be at an end. Canada cannot afford to ship her phosphates to England, and the sooner she finds this out the better. The immense accumulations of offal and refuse about the great cities ought to be utilized in the production of fertilizers, and these with the mineral phosphates should be sufficient to enrich, for generations to come, all the worn out land in the older provinces. At present the phosphate is exported and the offal is wasted, but sooner or later all this must be changed. —[Canadian Breeder.

HIRAM PHILLIPS."

A Startling Potatoe Yield

The editor of the Rural New Yorker reports a yield of potatoes upon its experiment grounds of 1391½ bushels per acre. They were dug Aug. 27, weighed, and the yield per acre figured out by disinterested parties. We are not informed as to the size of the field, nor much about the method of culture. This is at the rate of 8 bushels and 41 pounds per square rod. With rows two and three-fourths feet apart (33 inches), there would be six rows to the rod. The above yield would give five pecks and nearly seven pounds to each row one rod long. With the hills sixteen and a half inches apart, there would be twelve hills to the row, and almost seven pounds per hill, or a small fraction less than a half peck. There is plenty of room on an acre of land to bury 1390 bushels of potatoes, but not many farmers have yet learned how to coax that quantity to grow upon so small an area. It is worth something to know that it can be done. Four hundred and eighty-eight bushels was our largest yield of this crop, estimated from the product of one square rod. We are anxious to try again and intend to do so.—[N. E. Farmer.

The Cork Duck.

A pleasant trick to look at was the one which followed. He took a cocoanut shell with one end cut off, and filled it with water. In the water he placed a little piece of cork, having a bent pin on one side, and two straight pins on the other side, so that the cork as it floated roughly resembled a lilliputian duck. The cork lay dead in the water, and it was difficult to think what magic could possibly be got out of it. Presently the juggler, sitting about two yards off, took out a musical instrument and began to play a lively tune. Instantly the imitation duck commenced to dance violently in the water, suiting its motions to the music. The dancing continued till the tune was ended; then the juggler ordered the duck to salaam, and he was at once obeyed. He even requested the buoyant cork to dive to the bottem of the water, and his request was immediately complied with. While the performance was going on the cocoanut shell was standing almost at our feet, and the performer was not only sitting beyond reach, but both his hands were employed in playing the instrument.—[Chamber's Journal.

A QUEER DANISH AMUSEMENT.

Riding Up and Down Inclined Planes

It is called in Danish rutschban, and may as well be dubbed in English rush railway. A tower stands at either end of a railway, which is perhaps 180 feet in length, 40 feet high at one extremity, and half as high at the other. I climbed the rude staircase of the higher tower, and found myself in a room crowded with people waiting their opportunity for a ride. At the entrance stood a pheaton-like car on four small iron wheels, the car being very stout and holding two people with comfort. The wheels were in grooves, and the course extended over the descending and ascending slopes. The people would get into a car and be strapped in by a leathern boot; the car would be started down the inclined plane by an attendant, and away it would go down the first slope, and by its impetus rise to the next height, go over and down again, at each rise pitching a little lower, at each pitch rising to a lesser height, until the last slope, when it rushed up the hill, bumped against a buffer, and the two travellers got out. The car would then be seized, dragged aside, put upon a lift, hauled up to a height above, and sent back, with other passengers or empty, down a corresponding road parallel to the first and terminating in a similar low tower by the side of the one I was in, where it would be hoisted again into place, and be ready to make the round of the rush railway again.

I stood by the entrance where the car started down, watching the couples get into the vehicle and then go thundering down the slope. I saw sedate men who might have been bank presidents get in, and children, and ardent youths and maidens, two by two. They held each other in; they almost lost their hats; they bowed, and fell back upon the huge "thank-you-ma'am's" they looked frightened, and they looked bold; they smiled and they almost cried; but I heard no one scream. At length, when I had politely given way to those more eager I was driven by shame and an inextinguishable curiosity to try this reckless "coast." I paid the fare—about two and a half cents—and took my seat. I jammed my hat down over my brow, grasped the back of the car with one hand, and no doubt turned pale as the push was given and began that awful descent. I felt that thrilling sensation of vibration in the pit of my stomach which one has in a swing when descending, and then we shot up the slope, saw a new abyss, and plunged into it. A delicious reprieve was followed by another fearful descent; four times we dashed in the face of fate, and then, with one triumphant rush; flew up the last incline. I got out of the car with my wits standing on end, and tumbled down the staircase in a bewildered, groggy way, anxious to get my legs upon the immovable earth again.

There was no mistaking the thorough enjoyment which everybody took in this amusing place, and the decorum and good feeling seemed to come by nature. The applause was enthusiastic and energetic, and one formed a most agreeable impression of the sociability of the peo-

In Ohio there is one divorce case to every seven marriages. The other six pairs are probably boarding with their parents.

"To be weak is to be miserable"—that's boarding-house coffee. To be strong is to be more miserable still—that's boarding-school butter.

When Clara was asked what she would do if a nice young gentleman would ask her hand in marriage, she naively replied. "I don't think I'd no."

"Will you help me to press some leaves?" the maiden asked her lover. "If you will fasten them in your waist-belt I'll see what I can do," he answered.

"Let husbands consult their wives more and they would be happier," writes a wife in the Boston Globe. The use of the word "they" seems a little indefinite in this case.

"Yes, sir," said the stump speaker, "there are lots of real issues in this campaign." "So I see," remarked a bystander, pointing to an adjacent saloon, from which a crowd of drunken fellows came wobbling. "What do you mean?" "Why, 'reel issues,' of course."

An editor published in his paper: "All communications to the editor that are written on both sides of the paper will be thrown into the waste-basket." A day or two afterward he received a long communication from his girl. It was written on both sides of the paper, but it didn't get into the waste-basket.

A dolorous story is current of a gentleman who was asked to write some lines in a lady's album, and commenced "Beautiful nymph, let fall thy eye upon this page." He was surprised that his opening was not appreciated. He was afterward informed that one of the lady's eyes was of glass, and consequently removable.

"My child, I cannot consent to your marrying young Henry. You know perfectly well you are engaged to William." "Yes, papa, but William is on a three years' cruise." "Well, what has that to do with it?" "Why should I waste the time? Henry has solemnly promised that he will consent to a divorce as soon as William arrives."

"Why is it that the employes in telephone offices are all ladies?" Mrs. Brown made this enquiry of her husband. "Well," answered Mr. Brown, "the managers of the telephone companies were aware that no class of employes work so faithfully as those who were in love with their labor, and they knew that ladies would be fond of the work in telephone offices." "What is the work in a telephone office?" Mrs. Brown further inquired. "Talking," answered Mr. Brown.

Robert Buchanan, the English poet, wishes that Americans would "evoke a dèus ex machina of a more robust virility than is fashionable with supersensitive and superamatory misses." We have often thought that one of those italic things would fill a long-felt want, but owing to the press of business we could never get time to evoke it.

Europe's Ironclad Navies.

England stands first with twenty-five modern line-of-battle ships, fulfilling all requirements of the present time, and fourteen obsolete men-of-war, nine modern and six obsolete ironclads for coast defense, and three ironclads cruisers.

France follows with sixteen modern and nine obselete line-of-battle ships, and seven modern and eight obsolete ironclads for coast defense.

Next to these two most important naval powers ranks Germany, with nine modern (five ironclad frigates, four ironclad corvettes) line-of-battle ships, fulfilling all requirements of the present day, and three obsolete ironclad ships (the ironclad frigates Kronprinz and Frederick Karl, and the ironclad corvette Hansa) eleven modern ironclad vessels for coast defense (eleven ironclad gunboats all completed), and one obsolete vessel, the ironclad Arminius.

Austria takes fourth place, with three modern and seven obsolete line-of-battle ships.

Italy has two modern and eleven obsolete ironclad ships at her disposal.

Russia has only one single first-class line-of-battle ship, and seven obsolete ironclads, two modern and sixteen obsolete ironclad vessels for coast defense, and four ironclad cruisers.

Denmark possesses two modern and tw obsolete line-of-battle ships, and two modern and two obsolete ironclad vessels for coast defense.

Holland, one modern battle ship and seventeen modern ironclad vessels for coast defense.

This shows that Great Britian still holds first place with her ironclad fleet; France second, Germany third, Italy fourth, Russia fifth, and Austra sixth place. France, however, is building at present fourteen vessels of the most powerful description, and eight similarly powful ironclad vessels for coast defense, against seven line-of-battle ships and five ironclad cruisers building in Great Britain. In a few years, therefore, France will be able to dispose of thirty battle ships, of which twelve are first-class fighting power, and Great Britain of thirty-two battle ships, numbering, however, only a single vessel of about equal strength to the twelve French ships. Italy is constructing five battle ships of first-class power; Russia three battle ships and three ironclad cruisers; Germany, one ironclad cruiser, and two ironclad gunboats; Austria, one battle ship; Denmark, one ironclad for coast defense. Great Britain's pre-eminence on the seas is, therefore, most decidedly menaced by France, with the completion of the vessels building by both states. As Great Britain is obliged to employ a great portion of her fleet in the Mediterranean and at many distant stations, it may be presumed that from 1887 or 1888 a French fleet of forty-two ironclads would be opposed to an English fleet of, at most, thirty ironclads, including in the latter the vessels reserved for coast defense.

LOSS BY CHOLERA.

Figures Arrived at from Banker's Returns.

It is said that the loss which the continent has sustained this year from the cholera scare exceeds four millions and a half of money. The figures are arrived at from the bankers' returns as their accounts appeared at the commencement of the current month. The amount seems incredibly large, especially as the expenses of quarantine forms no part of the total. Switzerland has of course suffered most, as her special industry seems to consist in the housing and nurture and transport of travellers, but in actual, though not in relative importance, the loss to France has been greater. The Swiss harvest of tourists is reaped by her hotel-keepers, and railway companies only in the summer months, and it may be said that almost all the crop of 1884 has been lost. The calamity to France has been spread ever a wider area, but on the other hand, the severity of the trial has been mitigated by circumstances. The French seaside resorts have been fuller this year than in any season since 1878, ful- and the influx has consisted almost entirely of French, and very largely of Parisians. The same dread of disease or its probably consequent annoyances which has kept the English from crossing the channel, has kept the French in their own country, and here again Switzerland has been the chief sufferer. But even with these allowances the French losses have been considerable. The line from Marseilles north has for some weeks been congested with traffic, and yet the deficit, as compared with the averages of previous years, has exceeded 3,000,000 francs. The four principal lines of France show since the year commenced a loss of 11,000,000 francs, and in the case of the Paris, Lyons and Mediterranean company, the bad commencement will be followed by a worse sequel. The loss to these countries has indeed been a gain to our own. We have seen more Americans, and the Americans have seen more of England than in any year since the Franco-Prussian war.—London News.

Smith—Jones refuses to pay a little debt he owes me, and I want you to bring suit against him for the money.

Lawyer—All right; but lawyers, you know, always expect something in the way of a retainer.

Smith—Certainly; how much will it be?

Lawyer—About fifty dollars, I guess.

Smith—Fifty dollars? Why, Jones only owes me twenty-five dollars.

Lawyer—Oh, well, call it twenty-five dollars then.

who had been eating dried-apple pie at a railroad lunch-house, as he held one hand to his shattered jaw and produced a gimlet with the other. "Look at this confounded gimlet. I've found it in your pie and broke half the teeth in my head out on!" "Well, I declare!" said the landlord. "I wanted to use that yesterday and hunted all over for it. Much obliged, stranger."

"I tell you what," airily exclaimed Perkins as he sat down to the supper-table. "I was in a tight place this afternoon." "Yes, I know you were," interrupted his wife, in clear, cold utterances that cut like a knife. "I saw you coming out of it." And then it flashed across Perkins mind that he had incidentally stepped into a saloon with a friend for the purpose of examining a doubtful political statement with the aid of a magnifying glass, and his contemplated anecdote slipped from his grasp like money at a summer resort, while the supper was finished amid a silence so profound that he could plainly hear a napkin ring.

"I have always preserved my family honor," exclaimed an Arkansaw man, with a violent demonstration, "and I shall suffer no insult at this late day. You have said, sir that I am no gentleman. The consequences will be fatal to one of us." "I did not say that you were not a gentleman," replied a red-headed fellow with a whisky squint. "I said that you were a liar. Ain't that what I said, Jim?" turning to a companion. "That's what you said," Jim replied. "Then, sir, I beg your pardon," said the gentleman. "I simply misunderstood you, but you can not blame a man for upholding the good name of his family. Well, what are you going to take?"

The Best Medicine.

Speaking generally, it is not to the laboratory of the chemist that we should go for our potash salts, but to the laboratory of nature, and more especially to that of the vegetable kingdom. They exist in the green parts of all vegetables. This is illustrated by the manufacture of commercial potash from the ashes of the twigs and leaves of timber-trees. The more succulent the vegetable the greater the quantity of potash it contains, though there are some minor exceptions to this. As I have already stated, we extract and waste a considerable proportion of these salts when we boil vegetables and throw away the potage, which our wiser and more thrifty neighbors save. When we eat raw vegetables, as in salads, we obtain all their potash.

Fruits generally contain important quantities of potash salts, and it is upon these especially that the possible victims of lithic acid should rely. Lemons and grapes contain them most abundantly. Those who can not afford to buy these as articles of daily food may use cream of tartar, which, when genuine, is the natural salt of the grape, thrown down in the manner I shall describe when on the subject of the cookery of wines.—[W. Mattieu Williams, in Popular Science Monthly.

If it is part of prudence to face every claimant, and pay every just demand on your time, your talents, or your heart, always pay; for, first or last, you must pay your entire debt.

on one of the smaller branches, and these keep up a constant distillation of a clear fluid like water, which dropping to the ground, forms a puddle. If a vessel is placed under them in the evening, it contains three or four pints of fluid in the morning. To the question, whence is this fluid derived? the natives reply that the insects suck it out of the tree, and naturalists give the same answer. But Livingston could never find any wound in the bark, or any proof whatever that the insect pierced it. Our common frog hopper, which before it get its wings, is called "cuckoo spit" and lives on many plants in a froth spittle like fluid, is like the African insect, but as much smaller. Livingstone considers that they derive much of their fluid by absorbing it from the air. He found some of the insects on a castor oil plant, and he cut away about twenty inches of the bark between the insect and the tree, and destroyed all the vegetable tissue which carried the sap from the tree to the place where the insects were distilling. The distillation was then going on at the rate of one drop in every sixty-seven seconds, or five and a half tablespoonsful every twenty-four hours. Next morning although the supplies of sap were stopped, supposing them to come up from the ground, the yield was increased to one drop every five seconds, or one pint, in every twenty-four hours. He then cut the branch so much that it broke, but they still went on at the rate of one drop every five seconds; while another colony of the insects on a branch of the same tree gave a drop every seventeen seconds.—[The World of Wonder.

Power of Music.

It is true that most people are more impressed by what they see than by what they hear; so that it has become a maxim that one learns more readily through the eyes than through the ears. But Nature is a compensating mother. If the eye begets the most lasting impression, the ear imparts the most active stimulant. Few artists who appeal to the eye have so roused the vital action as those who seek the ear. An illustration of the power of sound, expressed in fitting music to fitting words, is given by Ben. Perley Poore in the Boston Budget. He says:

"Jenny Lind's ballad-singing carried her Washington audiences by storm. Without in the slighest degree compromising its character of a simple ballad, she infused into every line of it more of the poetic spirit and meaning than the words, upon the mere reading, seemed to contain.

"It was often the outpouring of the soul of a Scottish peasant lassie, yet it was one of the most charming pieces of vocalization ever listened to.

"What wondrous versatility was here! From Bellini to Burns—from the highest reach of Italian art to the most homely simplicity of Scottish minstrelsy—and the same effect produced by each!

"At the close of her singing the "Last Rose of Summer," on one occasion, Mr. Webster, who occupied a front seat, joined in demanding its repetition, and when Miss Lind came on the stage again he rose and bowed low twice, his swarthy features gleaming with gratification. The audience indorsed the compliment with vociferous applause."

AMONG OUR EXCHANGES.

When a man starts out to paint the town red he does not do it in water-colors.

A crank is a person who does not always agree with you, but has opinions of his own.

"I'm not in politics this year, but I'l take the stump all the same," said a tramp going down into the gutter for a half-smoked cigar.

"Ma, what are soldiers?" "They are men with arms, dear." "And what is an encampment?" "It is a place where the soldiers go to practice using their arms, my child." "Oh, yes, now I see why they always have an encampment at a place where there are plenty of pretty girls."

Mrs. Blank—"Is your barber a musician?" Mr. Blank—"Not that I know of." Mrs. Blank—"Then why does he call himself a 'professor' if he is not a violinist or something?' Mr. Blank—"Oh, that is because he fiddles around a customer's face in a violent manner with a viol razor."

Husband—It looks like rain, my dear. Don't you think we had better take an umbrella? Wife—Oh, no; we don't want to be bothered with it. Husband—You take great chances, my love. Wife—I know I do. If I were a man I would be a bold speculator. I would never be content, like you, to do an ordinary humdrum business that would just bring me a living. [An hour later, the couple standing in a narrow doorway with the rain beating fiercely in.] Wife—How do I look? Husband—Very much like a speculator, sharer of my joys and sorrows.

"Nothing too good for the Children."

There has been and is much false sentiment thrown away in this world, and in no one direction does this appear to be more strongly the case than in the treatment of children. Perhaps, however, it is not so much in the actual treatment of children as it is in the way in which this subject is treated in literature. There is a certain class of writers who are never

The Russian Government is said to have determined upon constructing the remaining 127 miles of the Transcaspian railway to Askabad. The rails have been ordered to be shipped at once from a southern manufactory down the Volga and across the Caspian.

Three hundred camels have recently been imported into Australia, and more are to follow soon. Should they thrive, multiply, and prove useful, it is predicted by enthusiasts that the time may come when they will be introduced into southern Europe, and even into England.

The czar's Warsaw tour was about as dismal a merrymaking as can well be conceived. At the state ball not a word of Polish was permitted, and when one was dropped by accident people looked timidly over their shoulders to see whether it had been overheard. The rooms were only half filled, and cheerless, notwithstanding the decorations.

Prof. Forster, who died recently at Aix-la-Chapelle, was one of the first of European entomologists. His collection of insects stands almost without a rival. It was prepared in the most careful manner and classified in strict accordance with scientific rules. Germans stand in fear lest the collection find its way into the South Kensington museum in London.

The Manchester ship canal bill has now been passed and thrown out twice by both lords and commons committees. Last year it occupied thirty nine days in committee, and was passed, and ten days in the lords, and was thrown out; and this session the lords committee sat forty one days and passed the bill, and the commons have taken twenty days and thrown it out.

Field Marshal Gen. Herwart von Bittenfield, who died a few weeks ago at the age of 88, was the oldest officer in the German army, and one of the few surviving German veterans who earned their first laurels at Waterloo or Leipsic. He took a leading part in the three great wars of the present emperor, and was present at Alsen, Koniggratz, and Sedan. His age exceeded the emperor's by only one year.

In the 58 provinces of European Russia there are 19,674,723 horses, of which number nearly 6,000,000 are in the military circle of Kazan. Complaint is made that too many horses are exported from assumed such proportions that all tramps who fail to give a satisfactory account of themselves are now arrested and lodged in Rome pending inquiry. What renders brigand capture the more difficult in many localities, is that the business of brigandism is followed by persons who are not always at it, but at times pursue rural occupations, and are apparently the most harmless of beings. The authorities continue to fail in their attempts to capture the brigand chief Tibuzi, who operates in the neighborhood of Viterbo. For a long time the farmers and landowners tried to resist his incursions, but now they submit to his terms and pay blackmail to secure a quiet life.

The following curious calculation is published in a Liverpool journal: "A parliamentary statistician has made a curious calculation, which has some bearing on the question, who wastes the time of parliament? Of course the Liberals say it is the Tories. But the real offender is Mr. Gladstone himself. Since he became Premier in 1880 he has spoken for 250 hours in the House of Commons. If every other member of the house exercised the privilege of free speech with the same volubility as the G. O. M., each session would extend to eighty-four thousand hours. In this case the session, which usually runs to six months, would be drawn out to eleven years, sitting twenty-four hours a day, Sunday included."

The twentieth detailed annual report of the registrar general of the marriages, births, and deaths in Ireland for 1883 shows that the marriages registered during the year numbered 21,368, births 118,163, and deaths 96,228. Both absolutely and in proportion to the estimated population the marriages and births are under the annual average for the preceding ten years; the mortality is somewhat in excess of the average. The recorded natural increase of population, or the excess of births over deaths, was 21,935, the loss by emigration amounting to 108,724. There would thus appear to have been a decrease of 86,789 in the population during the year. The estimated population in the middle of the year was 5,015,282.

A new form of paving has been in use in Berlin since last year, which seems to offer some advantages over wood. Layers of brick are put down and impregnated with asphalt. After a short period they lose any air and water they may contain, and absorb from 15 to 20 per cent. of the bituminous matter, becoming remarkably elastic, and capable of resisting pressure and damp. The traffic in the Berlin main thoroughfares is of a heavy character, and it has been found that the new paving lasts much longer than any of the other systems, added to which it offers a sure foothold to horses. Occasionally it is found that after three months' wear some of the bricks crumble into dust, but this is believed to arise from a faulty impregnation with asphalt, and not from any real defect in the system.

children as it is in the way in which this subject is treated in literature. There is a certain class of writers who are never weary of crying out against the "shut up parlor" which is considered too good for the children. Probably these writers are women, but probably they are not mothers, or they would not advocate the rights of children quite so strongly. The fact is, there is neither common sense nor kindness in the idea that no room is too good for children. If you yourself love to have every corner overrun by lawless children, you at least owe it to your friends and calling acquaintances to have one room in which one is not in danger of seating herself upon broken remnants of food, ruining delicate gloves by touching sticky latches and door knobs, or running the risk of a sprained ankle or broken neck by stepping unwarily upon a marble or rolling spool. If one is unwilling to do this much, it were better to hang out a placard at once: "This house is sacred to children. Nobody else has any natural rights or privileges here."—[Boston Courier.

The Adjustments of Life.

Some humorous philosopher avers that there is a way to have all one wants by simply wanting all one has. One thinks of it now and then in this world where "so easily things go wrong," and where circumstances are so transitory as a kaleidscope. It is possibly one of the secrets of happy living to attain that equipose that will not be deflected by the changes of events or the change of mind and mood of other people. Yet this carried out to its fullest results would imply an indifference that is merely insensibility, and what one gained in not feeling pain he would lose in not feeling pleasure. Rather than indifference one might praise the gods for a power of facile judgment to the inevitable; the power of making the best rather than the worst of the daily disappointments of life, and of gathering up the fragments, collecting the broken threads, readjusting the mismatched plans and getting what good one may out of them. Doing this, one finds that the law of compensation prevails. The world is so full of resources, of interest, of people, of plans. You fail of one thing on which your desire was centered, and, behold, a dozen things crowd into its place. Life, like nature, abhors a vacuum. A belief in the divinity of circumstances is a creed of comfort. To do what one can, to do all that is reasonable and right in the furtherance of a cherished plan, and then leave results to come as they will, and accept innovations if we must, is always wise. No loss, or failure, or disappointment is worth sacrificing one's serenity of spirit for or one's best energies for worthy achievment.

Pulled It Herself.

"Will you pull the bell!" she asked of a man across the aisle as the car reached the corner.

"No, madam," he answered with a bow, "but I will be most happy to pull the strap which rings the bell."

"Ah! but never mind! The strap is connected with two bells, and you might stop the wrong end of the car!"

And the look she turned upon him was full of triumph veneered with cayenne pepper.

there are 19,074,720 horses, of which number nearly 6,000,000 are in the military circle of Kazan. Complaint is made that too many horses are exported from the country. The number exported in 1879 was 19,000, in 1880 it was 24,000, in 1882 it was 35,269, and last year the number is believed to have reached 45,000. It is proposed that an export tax of 50 gold rubles on every horse valued at under 300 rubles be imposed.

It is said that Mr. Gamel, of Copenhagen, has offered to send his steamship the Dijmphana on a second expedition to the Arctic regions, via Franz Josef's land, subject to the condition that the Danish government will, as a moral acknowledgement of their interest in the expedition, grant a certain sum of money, however small, toward the expedition, under the same chief, Lieut. Hovgaard, of the royal Danish navy, to whom the crew of the Warna owed their rescue.

More ascents were made of Mont Blanc last August than in any corresponding August, no less than twenty-two persons having climbed the "monarch of mountains," which is nearly at the rate of one for every week day. Among them was a young English lady, who is an excellent mountaineer. The reported decline of Chamouni as a mountaineering centre led to threatening demonstrations by the guides and cochers against the author of an adverse paper on the Alpine club, who prudently left the village, on being warned by a friend, to avoid trouble.

The family house-boats, which are one of the most curious phases of domestic life in China, are as practically proving the old truism that "man wants but little here below," for the "little" which forms the clean and happy home of three generations is a boat about the size of two four-post beds set end to end, and covered in at night by a series of telescopic sliding roof, of bamboo matting. Here man and wife, grand-parents and little children cook, sleep, and worship; for, no matter how small the place, the family altar occupies the place of honor.

A painful instance of the dire distress experienced by some families in Sunderland, England, has just been discovered. A lady who kept a pig in the west part of the town, having her suspicions aroused, kept watch upon her stye, and was surprised at dusk to see a man and woman approach and scoop out the bread, etc., which had been put in for the animal's meal. The lady followed the couple to their home, and, after allowing a few minutes to elapse, followed them into the house, and was surprised to discover five little children sitting around a table and readily devouring the food taken from the pig's trough.

An anti-Semitic Austrian colonel, before marching to the scene of the autumn manœuvers at Auzem, wrote to a medical man there to find him lodging, adding that this must not be in a Jewish family. He received this reply: "Honored Colonel: The contingency which you contemplate with so much dissatisfaction, of having to live with Jews during your stay here, is happily obviated by circumstances. There are only two Jewish families in the town. The Archduke Albert is staying with one of them, the Archduke William with the other, which is my own. I have, etc."

Queen Victoria was very pretty in her youth. She had a lovely bloom, a brow white and smooth as polished ivory, a very pretty mouth, the short upper lip revealing a set of very fine teeth, and a profusion of light brown hair. Her arms and shoulders might have served as models for a sculptor. Every body knows that the royal beauty at present of the English court is the Princess of Wales, and photographs and portraits have been multiplied to give some idea to the out side world of her flower like and gracious loveliness. Queen Victoria, when she was first married, used to call her affectionately "My lily." But those who have never seen her can have but a faint idea of her peculiar and winning charms, which reside no less in the exquisite and simple grace of her manner and the sweetness of her expression than in the delicate outline of her features and shoulders, or in the lustre of her soft blue eyes.

Probably the most famous royal beauty of our epoch was the Empress Eugenie. Like the Princess of Wales, her great charm in her youth lay in the melancholy sweetness of her expression, and in the refined grace of her manners. Her complexion was lovely, her eyes of a true and transparent azure, and her hair was of a golden chestnut hue that was simply indescribably beautiful. The delicate outlines of her features, and the exquisite poise of her head on her long slender neck and shapely shoulders, have been immortalized on canvas and in marble. When she was first married she used to dress with great elegance and simplicity, her favorite color being delicate lilac. She was so beautiful in those early days that she called forth the chivalrous devotion of every American gentleman in Paris. But she received very little public homage, even in those days.

The Empsess of Austria twenty years ago! Ah! how lovely she was, the young and queenly Elizabeth, then in the full pride of her beauty that had won her a place upon the imperial throne of Austria! She was elegantly attired in white muslin, trimmed with valenciennes lace and set off with a sash of violet silk, embroidered with steel. From beneath her small turban hat showed coil upon coil of dark silken braids. The empress is even yet one of the most beautiful princesses of Europe, and certainly she is the queenliest. She looks the empress, every inch of her.

The Empress of Russia, like her sister, the Princess of Wales, is a very lovely woman, petite in form, with large, soft brown eyes, and a singularly sweet expression. The third sister, the Princess Thyra, now the Duchess of Cumberland, is on the contrary, very plain.

The daughters of the Princess of Wales are very shy and simple-mannered little girls, quite children yet, though the eldest is nearly sixteen. The youngest of the three, the Princess Maud, gives promise of considerable personal beauty. the eldest girl, the Princess Louise, has a heavy featured, inanimate countenance and is undeniably plain.

I think it must somewhere be written, said Dickens, that the virtues of mothers shall, occasionally, be visited on their children, as well as the sins of the fathers.

The Napanee Express.

NAPANEE, FRIDAY, OCT. 24, 1884.

—The special session of the British Parliament opened Wednesday. The Queen's speech was short. It urged the passage of the Franchise Bill and eulogized Gordon's defence of Khartoum.

—The Presidential election is waxing warmer as the fourth of November, the day of the great issue approaches. The election in Ohio was accompanied by much bloodshed, and reports of riots are numerous. It has been pretty clearly shown that Butler is in league with the Republicans to defeat Cleveland, and as a result his "boom" is about over. Cleveland's prospects are brightening every day.

—The Tichborne Claimant having served his term of imprisonment has been discharged on parole, and now the daily papers are resurrecting the evidence in this celebrated trial. Let them give us a rest. People have hardly yet survived the large doses of evidence case forced upon them years ago.

—The Standard has a queer idea of an equal division. It said last week that the gains and losses at the Napanee voters' count were about equally divided between the two parties. Forty-two Reform gains to ten Conservative is what our clever contemporary calls an equal division. The Standard's Faber pusher should attend the Mechanics' Institute evening classes and try and abstract some knowledge of arithmetic from the boy who does the sweeping.

—Then, to show how unfair it can be in reporting a voters' court, it gives a list of voters who were struck off the list, all of whom were Reformers. Notwithstanding that over three times that number of Conservatives were struck off not one of their names was published. In order that our readers may see the result of the proceedings we give in another column a complete list of the gains and losses on both the Tory organist to howl about Reform partizan officials.

—It is worthy of note that during the eighteen or twenty years Mr. John Webster held the office of town assessor, a voters' list court never occupied more than a couple of hours and the appeals were very few. This year the Tories accomplished the dismissal of Mr. Webster and put in a man whom they thought they could handle. The result looks very much as if their confidence was not misplaced. That they have been baulked in their little game is highly creditable to the few energetic Reformers who fought the issue. The motive which led to Mr. Webster's dismissal is now quite plain. It was not that his assessment of last year was bad, as they alleged, but because they wanted to be in a position to fix things for themselves this year. The result is that the town has been put to a large expense in getting the list restored to something like an honest one, and the taxes on several lots have been lost altogether. The men who voted for Mr. Webster's removal should be marked next January by every fair-minded and honest ratepayer.

—The Scott Act is sweeping everything in the shape of opposition before it in the counties where it is submitted. Simcoe adopted it by over 1,100 majority, the united counties of Stormont, Dundas and Glengarry have also adopted it, and yesterday it was voted upon in Peel. Bruce, Prince Edward, Huron and Dufferin will vote on the 30th inst. York County N.B., takes a vote on the same day. Norfolk pronounces on the question on November 11th. The Scott Act was defeated yesterday in Peel by a majority of 156.

—A correspondent in another column accuses one of our contemporaries of "bearing" the barley market, and insinuates that it is paid for such services by dealers. The writer must be mistaken. No journal laying claim to respectability could be bribed to do injury to the great majority of its readers. It does not follow that because a journal urges farmers to sell their grain in the fall that it has yielded to any improper overtures. The price of grain, taken one year with another, is invariably better at this season than later on, and the farmer who has made a point of selling early throughout his life has left his neighbor, who is always waiting for a rise, far behind in the race for riches. Then there is another important consideration. When farmers refuse to sell at the proper season, they invariably refuse to pay their accounts past due, and the result is that the business man who has entered into obligations with the wholesale dealers is unable to meet his paper, and in many instances suffers financial ruin. It would be much better all round if farmers would sell sufficient at the proper season at least to pay their store accounts. This holding over grain and making merchants wait for payment of accounts long past due is a much too one-sided transaction to be strictly honest.

That Road Matter.

MR. EDITOR,—In your issue of the 10th I perceived a letter having the signature of Mr Thos. Tapping, in which he attempts to corroborate "Antler's" letter that previously appeared in one of your local contemporaries. As I have no fancy to accede to his incredulity, I hope you will allow me to say a few words in response. He says he can vouch for the truth of every word the letters contained. As none of the letters having the signature of Antler had any reference to

TOWN COUNCIL.

Twenty-one free and intelligent electors played the role of spectators at the meeting of the Council on Monday evening and devoured with eager interest the words of wisdom which fell from the lips of the members of the august body.

The attendance of the members was very good, there being present:—His Worship the Mayor, Wilder Joy; Reeve Wilson, Dep. Reeve Carscallen and Couns. Stevens, Henwood, Perry, Lane, Rose, Carson, Gibbard and Wallace.

The minutes of the previous meeting were read and confirmed.

A petition for a sidewalk on the south side of Graham to Bridge Street was referred to the Street Committee with power to act.

A communication from Alex. Craig & Son was read. The firm stated that for the past eleven years they had kept in repair a road leading to their mill, at their own expense. They were willing to forego the entire amount of their expenditure previous to the present year, some $35, but asked to be allowed the sum of $15, expended during 1884.

John Gibbard and a number of others petitioned for a crossing on Centre Street.—Referred to Street Committee.

Moved by Coun. GIBBARD, seconded by Reeve WILSON, that the Street Committee report upon the communication of Messrs. Craig & Son.

Coun. LANE asked if the law would bear out the Council in making the expenditure asked for on a private road. If it was a public street he would like to know it.

Reeve WILSON said if this was not a public street, he would like to know what constitutes one. The one in question had been in use for thirty years.

The motion was carried.

An application for a remission of taxes was laid over indefinitely.

A letter was read from Mr. S. Gibson, stating that he had erected 317 rods of wire fence, and asking that he be paid the sum of $104 as previously agreed upon by the Council.

A guarantee was enclosed on behalf of the Cartwright estate, binding the owners to keep a wire fence on the premises referred to for a period of ten years.

The Clerk laid on the table a copy of the "transient traders' by-law" of the town of Cornwall, which was read, and after some discussion relative to the advisability of protecting our resident merchants from outsiders, the by-law was referred to the Committee on Printing and By-laws, with a view to considering whether the by-law in force here might not be improved. Power was given them to employ legal advice if necessary.

The Street Committee presented a report, regarding the wire fence alluded to by Mr. Gibson in his communication, and they recommended, in view of the fact that the fence was not as good a one as the Council had expected would be erected, that only twenty cents per rod be allowed instead of thirty-two, as previously agreed upon.

A long discussion then arose on the question, some of the members justifying the report, while others claimed that as the object which the Council desired had been effected by the erection of the present fence, and as a guarantee had been given for ten years, that body had no right to refuse to carry out its agreement.

An amendment was offered to the effect that the Council pay the amount in full, after which another amendment was made to pay Mr. Gibson $100 in full of account.

The resolution and amendments were voted down and the amendments were again offered in other form, but met a fate similar to that of their predecessors. A dead-lock having ensued, the question was laid over for future consideration.

The Street Committee recommended the payment of their pay list, amounting to $97.37, which was agreed to.

Mr. R. Richardson made verbal application for remission of poundage fees on some of his geese. He was informed that as the geese were at large, the Council could do nothing in the premises.

The following accounts were passed:—

Town of Cornwall for by-law		$1.00
Wilder Joy, selecting jurors		4.00
Ira Kimmerly,	do	4.00
P. Embury,	do	4.00
S. W. Pringle, work on town hall		3.95
Jas. Baldwin, cutting wood		1.00
G. N. W. Telegraph Company		55

The Council then adjourned.

Rest and Comfort to the Suffering.

"Brown's Household Panacea" has no equal for relieving pain, both internal and external. It cures Pain in the Side, Back or Bowels, Sore Throat, Rheumatism, Toothache, Lumbago, and any kind of a Pain or Ache. "It will most assuredly quicken the Blood and Heal, as its acting power is wonderful." "Brown's Household Panacea" being acknowledged as the great Pain Reliever, and of double the strength of any other Elixir or Liniment names was published. In order that our readers may see the result of the proceedings we give in another column a complete list of the gains and losses on both sides.

—The Standard went out of its way last week to make a most unwarranted attack upon Mr. Mills, acting County Registrar. It charged him with having been guilty of favoritism to Reformers in the matter of given evidence without exacting witness fees and producing documents without subpœna, and thereupon indited a nice little homily on the iniquity of public officials making an exhibition of partizanship. The charges are entirely false. Mr. Mills was subpœnaed to give evidence by the Reformers, and for every search he was paid full fees. It is true that he did not exact witness fees in every instance, no more than did many other gentlemen who gave evidence. But that was his own business. He was entitled to a fee for every call upon him had he cared to exact it. His intention was to treat both sides alike in the matter of witness fees, and he would not have departed from that resolve even in one instance had he not been roundly abused and misrepresented by the rather excitable counsel who represented Messrs. Holmes, Davis & Co., for the great Tory party. Had he been treated with even common civility he would not have claimed the fee which was due him. It is needless for us here to enter any defence of Mr. Mills. Reformers and Conservatives alike who have had business at the Registry Office have always found him courteous, obliging and painstaking in the performance of duties. His position did not come to him as "the reward of political service or the spoil of party triumph," as the Tory organ falsely states. Politics had nothing whatever to do with his appointment—he was placed there solely on account of his capability to fill the position, and he has performed the duties well. The official the organ had in view when it thus described the way in which he was shelved was of much recent appointment, and he is not connected with the county buildings either.

—If the Tory organ was at all honest in in its condemnation of partizan officials it should have devoted some of its space to the town and county clerks. The former was almost constantly bobbing in and out of the witness box at the call of the counsel for the Conservatives (without receiving witness fees either), and the nature of his evidence was such as would lead people to suppose that he had constituted himself a board of valuators as it were, whose duty it was to increase the valuation of the property of Tories and lower that of Reformers. Mr. Embury, no doubt, was conscientious in the matter; indeed we would be loth to charge him to the contrary, but ordinary discretion should have told him that a person occupying the position he does should avoid placing himself in the position of being even suspected of partizanship. Then as to Mr. F.A. Roe. His efforts to retain his name on the East ward list was the subject of general comment. He testified that he had for three years paid the rent on a property there, and had received receipts therefor. Mr. Forward, the agent for the Cartwright estate, testified that the lease was in Mr. A.H. Roe's name and he had never given a receipt to to the son, and in fact the last payment was made by Mr. Roe while he was ill and sitting in his carriage on the street. This contradictory evidence led the Judge to adjourn the case to give Mr. F. A. Roe an opportunity of producing the receipts, but the young man being unable to procure even one his name was struck off the list. After this exhibition surely it does not lie with vouch for the truth of every word the letters contained. As none of the letters having the signature of Antler had any reference to me, I mean to make no reply relative to them. The libellous letter I alluded to had the signature of "A Taxpayer," whom I believe to be Mr. Tapping. In that letter it was alleged that my gang consisted of four men altogether, on July 11th, on Barrie Road No. 2. Now, as the Barrie Road work was the most important paragraph in his letter in the issue of yours of the 10th inst., my object is to promulgate the truth concerning the subject, and confirm the fact by the testimony of three of the workmen who were on the road the aforesaid date.

We, the undersigned, do hereby certify that on the 11th of July we were employed by Mr. Kennelly, on Barrie Road No. 2, and we can testify that the whole constructing party consisted of twelve men.

Signed, ROBT. ARMSTRONG.
ED. KENNELLY.
THOS. GUINA.

In one of my letters I said there were thirteen men. As I counted the names there appeared thirteen, but in carrying forward the days I found the week of the 11th Jeremiah Kennelly was absent. This, of course, was the cause of the mistake. What but mischief can his object be? His calumny can do me no harm in this locality. The people are well acquainted with all the workmen that laboured on Barrie Road No. 2. Perhaps the gentleman's views may be to arm the opposition by his incredible writings. But this he cannot do by any means as the prudent electors of the township of Barrie know better than to be deluded by him.

Now, in reference to a respectable lady to whom he says I have included in my dirty slang. To this lady I have not in any way given the slightest offence, nor even was it my intention to offer her any insult. I feel confident that I have done her an honor in saying she did not appreciate his amorous advances. I am sure the neighbors will exonerate her in the prudent course she pursued. It is an old proverb "Love is blind," but as the days swiftly glide by we see it has a change in its place of abode; and as the gentleman had no fascinating quality, the lady made a very wise selection.

I hope the gentleman in future will more strictly adhere to the truth and not pay so much attention to "fish stories."

Yours truly, JOHN KENNELLY.

NOTE.—This correspondence has been much too long. Mr. Kennelly has quite clearly established the fact that he had the dozen men at work, and that is all the public is interested in. This must close the discussion. We cannot afford space for personal wrangling.—[Ed. THE EXPRESS.

The Controverted Elections Act of Ontario.

ELECTION FOR THE ELECTORAL DISTRICT OF LENNOX HOLDEN ON THE TWENTY-FIRST AND TWENTY-EIGHTH DAYS OF AUGUST, A. D., 1884.

The Petition of Andrew Gordon Hamilton, of the Town of Napanee, in the County of Lennox and Addington, Insurance Agent, whose name is subscribed.

1. Your Petitioner is a person who had a right to vote and who did vote at the Election to which this Petition relates.

2. Your Petitioner states that the election was holden on the twenty-first and twenty-eighth days of August, A. D., 1884, when George Tate Blackstock and George D. Hawley were candidates, and the Returning Officer has returned the said George D. Hawley as being duly elected.

3. And your Petitioner says that the said George D. Hawley was by himself and by his agents and by other persons on his behalf guilty of corrupt practices as that term is defined in and by "The Election Act of Ontario" and "The Controverted Elections Act of Ontario," before, during and after the said Election, whereby the said George D. Hawley was and is incapacitated to serve in the Legislative Assembly for Ontario, and the said election and return of the said George D. Hawley was and is wholly null and void.

4. That the said George D. Hawley by himself and by his agents before and during the said Election prepared and carried out a corrupt scheme or plan for bringing into and did bring into the said Electoral District divers strangers for the purpose of bribing and who did bribe large numbers of the Electors of the said Electoral District to vote for the said George D. Hawley.

Wherefore your Petitioner prays that it may be determined—

1. That the Election of the said George D. Hawley was and is null and void.
2. And that the said George D. Hawley was, personally, guilty of corrupt practices within the meaning of or as defined by "The Election Act of Ontario" and "The Controverted Elections Act of Ontario," and that corrupt practices, as defined by the the said Statutes, were committed by the agents of and other persons on behalf of the said George D. Hawley, by and with his actual knowledge and consent.

The Napanee Express.

NAPANEE. FRIDAY, OCT. 24, 1884.

—The special session of the British Parliament opened Wednesday. The Queen's speech was short. It urged the passage of the Franchise Bill and eulogized Gordon's defence of Khartoum.

—The Presidential election is waxing warmer as the fourth of November, the day of the great issue approaches. The election in Ohio was accompanied by much bloodshed, and reports of riots are numerous. It has been pretty clearly shown that Butler is in league with the Republicans to defeat Cleveland, and as a result his "boom" is about over. Cleveland's prospects are brightening every day.

—The Tichborne Claimant having served his term of imprisonment has been discharged on parole, and now the daily papers are resurrecting the evidence in this celebrated trial. Let them give us a rest. People have hardly yet survived the large doses of evidence case forced upon them years ago.

—The Standard has a queer idea of an equal division. It said last week that the gains and losses at the Napanee voters' count were about equally divided between the two parties. Forty-two Reform gains to ten Conservative is what our clever contemporary calls an equal division. The Standard's Faber pusher should attend the Mechanics' Institute evening classes and try and abstract some knowledge of arithmetic from the boy who does the sweeping.

—Then, to show how unfair it can be in reporting a voters' court, it gives a list of voters who were struck off the list, all of whom were Reformers. Notwithstanding that over three times that number of Conservatives were struck off not one of their names was published. In order that our readers may see the result of the proceedings we give in another column a complete list of the gains and losses on both the Tory organist to howl about Reform partizan officials.

—It is worthy of note that during the eighteen or twenty years Mr. John Webster held the office of town assessor, a voters' list court never occupied more than a couple of hours and the appeals were very few. This year the Tories accomplished the dismissal of Mr. Webster and put in a man whom they thought they could handle. The result looks very much as if their confidence was not misplaced. That they have been baulked in their little game is highly creditable to the few energetic Reformers who fought the issue. The motive which led to Mr. Webster's dismissal is now quite plain. It was not that his assessment of last year was bad, as they alleged, but because they wanted to be in a position to fix things for themselves this year. The result is that the town has been put to a large expense in getting the list restored to something like an honest one, and the taxes on several lots have been lost altogether. The men who voted for Mr. Webster's removal should be marked next January by every fair-minded and honest ratepayer.

—The Scott Act is sweeping everything in the shape of opposition before it in the counties where it is submitted. Simcoe adopted it by over 1,100 majority, the united counties of Stormont, Dundas and Glengarry have also adopted it, and yesterday it was voted upon in Peel. Bruce, Prince Edward, Huron and Dufferin will vote on the 30th inst. York County N.B., takes a vote on the same day. Norfolk pronounces on the question on November 11th. The Scott Act was defeated yesterday in Peel by a majority of 156.

—A correspondent in another column accuses one of our contemporaries of "bearing" the barley market, and insinuates that it is paid for such services by dealers. The writer must be mistaken. No journal laying claim to respectability could be bribed to do injury to the great majority of its readers. It does not follow that because a journal urges farmers to sell their grain in the fall that it has yielded to any improper overtures. The price of grain, taken one year with another, is invariably better at this season than later on, and the farmer who has made a point of selling early throughout his life has left his neighbor, who is always waiting for a rise, far behind in the race for riches. Then there is another important consideration. When farmers refuse to sell at the proper season, they invariably refuse to pay their accounts past due, and the result is that the business man who has entered into obligations with the wholesale dealers is unable to meet his paper, and in many instances suffers financial ruin. It would be much better all round if farmers would sell sufficient at the proper season at least to pay their store accounts. This holding over grain and making merchants wait for payment of accounts long past due is a much too one-sided transaction to be strictly honest.

That Road Matter.

MR. EDITOR,—In your issue of the 10th I perceived a letter having the signature of Mr Thos. Tapping, in which he attempts to corroborate "Antler's" letter that previously appeared in one of your local contemporaries. As I have no fancy to accede to his incredulity, I hope you will allow me to say a few words in response. He says he can vouch for the truth of every word the letters contained. As none of the letters having the signature of Antler had any reference to

TOWN COUNCIL.

Twenty-one free and intelligent electors played the role of spectators at the meeting of the Council on Monday evening and devoured with eager interest the words of wisdom which fell from the lips of the members of the august body.

The attendance of the members was very good, there being present:—His Worship the Mayor, Wilder Joy; Reeve Wilson, Dep. Reeve Carscallen and Couns. Stevens, Henwood, Perry, Lane, Rose, Carson, Gibbard and Wallace.

The minutes of the previous meeting were read and confirmed.

A petition for a sidewalk on the south side of Graham to Bridge Street was referred to the Street Committee with power to act.

A communication from Alex. Craig & Son was read. The firm stated that for the past eleven years they had kept in repair a road leading to their mill, at their own expense. They were willing to forego the entire amount of their expenditure previous to the present year, some $35, but asked to be allowed the sum of $15, expended during 1884.

John Gibbard and a number of others petitioned for a crossing on Centre Street.—Referred to Street Committee.

Moved by Coun. GIBBARD, seconded by Reeve WILSON, that the Street Committee report upon the communication of Messrs. Craig & Son.

Coun. LANE asked if the law would bear out the Council in making the expenditure asked for on a private road. If it was a public street he would like to know it.

Reeve WILSON said if this was not a public street, he would like to know what constitutes one. The one in question had been in use for thirty years.

The motion was carried.

An application for a remission of taxes was laid over indefinitely.

A letter was read from Mr. S. Gibson, stating that he had erected 317 rods of wire fence, and asking that he be paid the sum of $104 as previously agreed upon by the Council.

A guarantee was enclosed on behalf of the Cartwright estate, binding the owners to keep a wire fence on the premises referred to for a period of ten years.

The Clerk laid on the table a copy of the "transient traders' by-law" of the town of Cornwall, which was read, and after some discussion relative to the advisability of protecting our resident merchants from outsiders, the by-law was referred to the Committee on Printing and By-laws, with a view to considering whether the by-law in force here might not be improved. Power was given them to employ legal advice if necessary.

The Street Committee presented a report, regarding the wire fence alluded to by Mr. Gibson in his communication, and they recommended, in view of the fact that the fence was not as good a one as the Council had expected would be erected, that only twenty cents per rod be allowed instead of thirty-two, as previously agreed upon.

A long discussion then arose on the question, some of the members justifying the report, while others claimed that as the object which the Council desired had been effected by the erection of the present fence, and as a guarantee had been given for ten years, that body had no right to refuse to carry out its agreement.

An amendment was offered to the effect that the Council pay the amount in full, after which another amendment was made to pay Mr. Gibson $100 in full of account.

The resolution and amendments were voted down and the amendments were again offered in other form, but met a fate similar to that of their predecessors. A dead-lock having ensued, the question was laid over for future consideration.

The Street Committee recommended the payment of their pay list, amounting to $97.37, which was agreed to.

Mr. R. Richardson made verbal application for remission of poundage fees on some of his geese. He was informed that as the geese were at large, the Council could do nothing in the premises.

The following accounts were passed:—

Town of Cornwall for by-law	$1.00
Wilder Joy, selecting jurors	4.00
Ira Kimmerly, do	4.00
P. Embury, do	4.00
S. W. Pringle, work on town hall	3.95
Jas. Baldwin, cutting wood	1.00
G. N. W. Telegraph Company	55

The Council then adjourned.

Rest and Comfort to the Suffering.

"Brown's Household Panacea" has no equal for relieving pain, both internal and external. It cures Pain in the Side, Back or Bowels, Sore Throat, Rheumatism, Toothache, Lumbago, and any kind of a Pain or Ache. "It will most assuredly quicken the Blood and Heal, as its acting power is wonderful." "Brown's Household Panacea" being acknowledged as the great Pain Reliever, and of double the strength of any other Elixir or Liniment names was published. In order that our readers may see the result of the proceedings we give in another column a complete list of the gains and losses on both sides.

—The Standard went out of its way last week to make a most unwarranted attack upon Mr. Mills, acting County Registrar. It charged him with having been guilty of favoritism to Reformers in the matter of given evidence without exacting witness fees and producing documents without subpœna, and thereupon indited a nice little homily on the iniquity of public officials making an exhibition of partizanship. The charges are entirely false. Mr. Mills was subpœnaed to give evidence by the Reformers, and for every search he was paid full fees. It is true that he did not exact witness fees in every instance, no more than did many other gentlemen who gave evidence. But that was his own business. He was entitled to a fee for every call upon him had he cared to exact it. His intention was to treat both sides alike in the matter of witness fees, and he would not have departed from that resolve even in one instance had he not been roundly abused and misrepresented by the rather excitable counsel who represented Messrs. Holmes, Davis & Co., for the great Tory party. Had he been treated with even common civility he would not have claimed the fee which was due him. It is needless for us here to enter any defence of Mr. Mills. Reformers and Conservatives alike who have had business at the Registry Office have always found him courteous, obliging and painstaking in the performance of duties. His position did not come to him as "the reward of political service or the spoil of party triumph," as the Tory organ falsely states. Politics had nothing whatever to do with his appointment—he was placed there solely on account of his capability to fill the position, and he has performed the duties well. The official the organ had in view when it thus described the way in which he was shelved was of much recent appointment, and he is not connected with the county buildings either.

—If the Tory organ was at all honest in in its condemnation of partizan officials it should have devoted some of its space to the town and county clerks. The former was almost constantly bobbing in and out of the witness box at the call of the counsel for the Conservatives (without receiving witness fees either), and the nature of his evidence was such as would lead people to suppose that he had constituted himself a board of valuators as it were, whose duty it was to increase the valuation of the property of Tories and lower that of Reformers. Mr. Embury, no doubt, was conscientious in the matter; indeed we would be loth to charge him to the contrary, but ordinary discretion should have told him that a person occupying the position he does should avoid placing himself in the position of being even suspected of partizanship. Then as to Mr. F.A. Roe. His efforts to retain his name on the East ward list was the subject of general comment. He testified that he had for three years paid the rent on a property there, and had received receipts therefor. Mr. Forward, the agent for the Cartwright estate, testified that the lease was in Mr. A.H. Roe's name and he had never given a receipt to to the son, and in fact the last payment was made by Mr. Roe while he was ill and sitting in his carriage on the street. This contradictory evidence led the Judge to adjourn the case to give Mr. F. A. Roe an opportunity of producing the receipts, but the young man being unable to procure even one his name was struck off the list. After this exhibition surely it does not lie with vouch for the truth of every word the letters contained. As none of the letters having the signature of Antler had any reference to me, I mean to make no reply relative to them. The libellous letter I alluded to had the signature of "A Taxpayer," whom I believe to be Mr. Tapping. In that letter it was alleged that my gang consisted of four men altogether, on July 11th, on Barrie Road No. 2. Now, as the Barrie Road work was the most important paragraph in his letter in the issue of yours of the 10th inst., my object is to promulgate the truth concerning the subject, and confirm the fact by the testimony of three of the workmen who were on the road the aforesaid date.

We, the undersigned, do hereby certify that on the 11th of July we were employed by Mr. Kennelly, on Barrie Road No. 2, and we can testify that the whole constructing party consisted of twelve men.

Signed, ROBT. ARMSTRONG.
ED. KENNELLY.
THOS. GUINA.

In one of my letters I said there were thirteen men. As I counted the names there appeared thirteen, but in carrying forward the days I found the week of the 11th Jeremiah Kennelly was absent. This, of course, was the cause of the mistake. What but mischief can his object be? His calumny can do me no harm in this locality. The people are well acquainted with all the workmen that laboured on Barrie Road No. 2. Perhaps the gentleman's views may be to arm the opposition by his incredible writings. But this he cannot do by any means as the prudent electors of the township of Barrie know better than to be deluded by him.

Now, in reference to a respectable lady to whom he says I have included in my dirty slang. To this lady I have not in any way given the slightest offence, nor even was it my intention to offer her any insult. I feel confident that I have done her an honor in saying she did not appreciate his amorous advances. I am sure the neighbors will exonerate her in the prudent course she pursued. It is an old proverb "Love is blind," but as the days swiftly glide by we see it has a change in its place of abode; and as the gentleman had no fascinating quality, the lady made a very wise selection.

I hope the gentleman in future will more strictly adhere to the truth and not pay so much attention to "fish stories."

Yours truly, JOHN KENNELLY.

NOTE.—This correspondence has been much too long. Mr. Kennelly has quite clearly established the fact that he had the dozen men at work, and that is all the public is interested in. This must close the discussion. We cannot afford space for personal wrangling.—[Ed. THE EXPRESS.

2. Your Petitioner states that the election was holden on the twenty-first and twenty-eighth days of August, A. D., 1884, when George Tate Blackstock and George D. Hawley were candidates, and the Returning Officer has returned the said George D. Hawley as being duly elected.

3. And your Petitioner says that the said George D. Hawley was by himself and by his agents and by other persons on his behalf guilty of corrupt practices as that term is defined in and by "The Election Act of Ontario" and "The Controverted Elections Act of Ontario," before, during and after the said Election, whereby the said George D. NAPANEE VOTERS' LIST.

A Gain of Thirty-two for the Reformers.

The Court for revision of the Napanee Voters' List occupied four days last week. Over two hundred appeals were heard, and this did not include all the errors the list contained. Since the appeals were entered it has been ascertained that several properties have not been assessed at all. The house of Mr. Alex. Hosey, East-st, and that of Mr. Robert Webster are among those upon which the town will lose the taxes. Several large property holders are omitted in other wards—notably John Herring, Esq., in East ward, and Dr. Leonard, Centre ward. These omissions cannot, of course, now be remedied. Below we give a complete list of those struck off the list and put on by both parties. The Reformers, for municipal purposes, gained fifteen in West ward, twenty two in Centre ward, and East ward stood even. On the parliamentary vote the Reformers made a gain of thirty-two.

WEDDING AT DESERONTO.

An Event of Unusual Interest—A Fitting Presentation—Tour Eastward.

The Church of the Redeemer, Deseronto, was crowded on Wednesday by the friends and relatives assembled to witness the marriage of Miss Louise Rathbun, daughter of H. B. Rathbun, Esq., of the Rathbun Company, to Edward C. French, son of Rev. E. W. French, D. D., of Jersey City, N. J. The handsome church was prettily decorated with natural flowers and looked exceedingly attractive. The company as they arrived were ushered to their seats by Dr. Clinton and Messrs. Chas. A. Millener, F. W. Powell and Harry Young. At the appointed hour the bride entered, leaning on the arm of her father and followed by her bridesmaids, Miss Topp and Miss Blaikie, of Toronto, the groom being supported by his brother, Mr. Albert French and Mr. W. B. Rathbun. The ceremony was performed by Rev. R. J. Craig, M. A., pastor of the church, assisted by Rev. Dr French, father of the groom The bride looked charming. At the close of the marriage ceremony an interesting episode occurred—the presentation of an elegantly bound family bible to the wedded couple by the board of managers on behalf of the congregation. This was in accordance with the time-honored custom, the wedding being the first, however, that had taken place in the church. After the event the party, together with a large number of invited friends, repaired to the residence of the bride's parents, where a sumptuous dejeuner was held. As the bride was a great favorite with a large circle of friends, the bridal presents were unusually numerous, costly and elegant, and were greatly admired. Mr. and Mrs. French took the Grand Trunk express going east for a very extended tour. They visit Quebec, Halifax, Boston and other points. They are followed, it is unnecessary to add, by the congratulations and best wishes of all the residents of Deseronto and a host of friends elsewhere. There were a large number of guests present, including ex-Mayor McMurrich, of Toronto, the Misses McMurrich, and Judge Wilkison and wife, of Napanee.

HYMENIAL.

Stratton—Boyd.

And still the rage for weddings goes on. This time the happy couple are Harvey J. Stratton of Richmond, and Miss Sara J. Boyd of Thurlow. On Wednesday, the 15th, there were seen wending their way from Brighton, Belleville, Richmond, Kingston, Madoc and elsewhere, many friends of both parties, who were greeted with a cheerful, happy smile at the home of the bride's mother in Thurlow. By 11 a.m., the time set for the ceremony, the residence was packed with delighted guests. Rev. J. B. Stratton, uncle of the groom, officiated in his usual happy style. Mr. Robt. Boyd acted a groomsman, and Miss Maggie Stratton as bridesmaid. The ladies were both neatly attired. The many presents were most splendid, and yet, not better by any means than deserved. We append a partial list:—

Officiating clergyman, a beautiful embossed certificate framed in gilt; Fred Cobb, silver cake basket; Willie Cobb, parlor lamp; Mrs. Cobb, fruit dish; Mrs. Brown, cake plate; Miss Sprague sauce dish; groom, parlor lamps; bride's mother, sett of silver spoons, knives and forks; Willie Boyd, doz sauce dishes; Ida Stratton, fancy cup and saucer; Wm. Fletcher, fruit dish; J. F. Stickney, bedspread; Mr. and Mrs. Colter, bedspread and table linen; Mr. Howe, large water pitcher; Mrs. York, fruit dish; Mr. and Mrs. G. Henderson, silver pickle dish; Mr. and Mrs. Boldrick, silver pickle cruet; Mr. and Mrs. J. Sine, parlor lamp; Mrs. Crindass, water pitcher; Mr. and Mrs. R. Sagar, silver pickle cruet; bridesmaid, silver butter knife; Mr. and Mrs. C. A. Stratton, looking glass and bracket; groomsman, hand satchel; Jessie Spence, silver napkin ring; Elijah Colter, cake plate; Mr. Conger, broom.

After a most sumptuous repast the guests dispersed, many of the older ones thinking if they were only young again how differently their weddings would be celebrated. We wish "the two made one" a most prosperous voyage o'er the sea of time.

Fluid Lightning.

Fluid Lightning is the only cure for Toothache Headache, Earache and Neuralgia. It does not take a day or an hour to cure it, but in less than a minute all pain is gone. Thousands have tested its merits within the last year. Fluid Lightning is also a positive cure for Rheumatism. The worst possible cases have been permanently cured in one week. Price, 25c., at A. T. Grange's and T. A. Huffman's drug stores, Napanee; also, at James Aylsworth's drug store, Tamworth.

A Successful Result.

Mr. Bloomer, of Hamilton, Ont., suffered for many years with a painful running sore on one of his legs, which baffled all attempts to heal until he used Burdock Blood Bitters, which speedily worked a perfect cure.

Prompt Measures.

Prompt measures should be used to break up sudden colds and cure coughs in their early stages. Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam does this most speedily and effectively.

Chickens	25	0 30
Cheese contracted for 11½

An Agreeable Surprise.

Those who try Burdock Blood Bitters as a regulator of the bowels, or to purify the blood, aid digestion, regulate the liver and kidneys, or strengthen tired nature, are agreeably surprised at the prompt benefit derived.

Cruelly Murdered.

In the Province of Ontario every year thousands are being slowly murdered by taking unsuitable, untried nostrums for such complaints as Costiveness, Indigestion, Liver Complaint, Kidney Troubles, etc., who might easily gain lost strength and energy by using McGregor's Speedy Cure. To convince them that such is the case we will give them a free trial bottle at T. A. Huffman's and at A. T. Grange's drug stores, Napanee; also, at James Aylsworth's drug store, Tamworth.

A Decided Hit.

Hagyard's Yellow Oil touches the right spot every time when applied for rheumatism, neuralgia, pain, soreness or lameness, and internally for colds, sore throat, etc., it is equally infallible.

Again there was a slight movement of the thin firmly-set lips, and this time it was accompanied by a gleam of swift amusement in the keen dark eyes which was equally quick to pass away. No doubt he thought, this beautiful girl had sent for him for some slight matter—to watch a rival's movements or a husband's—and the whole thing would turn out a storm in a tea-cup.

"Such matters are not unusual with us," he said calmly.

"I suppose not," she answered, looking at him with something like curiosity mingled with awe.

"On the contrary, they are of daily occurrence," he pursued. "Will you allow me to ask one question, madam?"

"Certainly. What is it?" she said, with a flash of terror in her beautiful eyes.

"The letter received, desiring my attendance, was signed 'Sidney Daunt,'" he said, taking out a little note-book and glancing at it. "May I ask who the writer was?"

"I was the writer."

"But the name is a man's name," he said, quietly.

"It is mine, nevertheless," she rejoined, with some haughtiness. "I am Sidney Daunt."

He made a slight bow, and there was another short dause.

"There is one thing I wish to ask you," she said nervously. "I should like the object of your visits here to remain a perfect secret; I do not wish any member of my household to suspect who you are, or the reasons for your visits here—that that is, if you are obliged to repeat this one."

"You need be under no apprehensions on that score," he said gravely. "I need scarcely say that we are used to secrecy."

Another slight pause.

"It is a very painful matter," Sidney began, her lips quivering a little; "and I can't give you many particulars. Personally I—I know no more of the matter than any body can know, except that I am assured of the innocence of one person whom others think guilty."

The man looked at her more attentively now.

"May I ask how you possess that assurance?" he said.

"By my knowledge of the character of the accused," she replied. "I know that it is impossible that he should have committed the crime of which he is thought to be guilty."

"I am afraid that very unlikely persons turn out to be guilty, madam," he remarked, with more interest than he had yet shown; and, drawing up a chair, he sat down, and leaning forward, he said gravely—"Will you tell me all you can, madam? My time and your own too, I dare say, are not without their value; and, if you wish the members of your household to remain ignorant of my presence here, it will be necessary to make my visits as short as possible."

"Yes," she said nervously. "I think it will be wiser not to come here again. I will meet you somewhere, if it is necessary. It applies equally well in our case. Unless you tell me the whole truth and all your suspicions, I can do but little."

"I will answer any questions," she murmured faintly.

"Thank you. Then do you think that Mr. Greville—that was the name—I think I am not mistaken—was in love with Mrs. Rutledge?"

"I think so," Sidney murmured.

"Therefore her marriage was a great disappointment to him?"

"Yes."

"So great that he was not able to hide it from you, to whom he was engaged?"

"He did not try to do so. We were very old friends."

"The coroner's jury brought in a verdict of wilful murder against him. They could not do otherwise; the proofs were very strong against him."

"But he was innocent."

"And yet he ran away, and Mrs. Rutledge disappeared at the same time!" the man remarked, with a smile. "Mrs. Daunt, I do not wish to distress you—on the contrary, my only object is to spare you pain and suspense. Let the matter rest; it will be better for Mr. Greville and all concerned. He has had a wonderful escape from punishment; the inquiry and search after him must have been of a very lukewarm kind, or he would have been found long ere this. The matter has sunk into oblivion now. Do not reopen it."

"You think him guilty," she said passionately; "but I am convinced of his innocence. Oh, sir,"—she stretched out her hands with a little appealing gesture—"you do not know how gentle he was, how incapable of doing such a crime! He was as innocent of it as you are. I cannot give up this endeavor to prove his innocence," she added, so earnestly that tears rose in her beautiful eyes. "No one ever tried before; he had not one friend here to defend him. His father believed him guilty. I could do nothing then; and all these long months he has been hunted and in misery and concealment. But now I am rich, I have plenty of money, and I cannot remain passive. Will you help me? Ah, do not make up your mind to his guilt! Surely your experience has taught you how very often innocent people have been condemned, and even proofs are not always to be depended upon? Do help, me sir; I am so powerless alone!"

"But your husband?" he said gently, touched by her passionate distress and by the lovely appealing face.

"He will not help me," she answered, weeping. "He believes him guilty; besides, was he—Frank—not my lover once?" she added passionately. "Can you expect my husband to help him?"

"Ah, true!" he answered gravely. "I had forgotten."

"Think what his life has been!" she continued eagerly, seeing that her words had touched him. "He is innocent, and he suffers as if he were guilty. He has no friends—he whom every one liked once, for whom every one had a kindly word. His father is wealthy, and he has been starving: his sister is fading away, dying from a broken heart at his misery; and he has not a friend—not a friend but me, a poor helpless woman, baffled at

"And others, I dare say. Mr. Greville's attentions could not have been very marked however, since you tell me that he was engaged to you."

The color rose slowly in the lovely anxious face. Remembering his earnest injunction to tell him the truth, she hesitated for a moment, then said bravely—

"We were not engaged until Miss Neil waa engaged to Mr. Rutledge."

"Ah!"

The monosyllable was full of meaning, for the questioner was keen enough to read on Sidney's face that there was something more to hear.

"Mr. Rutledge was a wealthy man?"—"Yes, very wealthy."

"And the young lady preferred wealth. All this seems no doubt very trivial to you, Mrs. Daunt: but we are accustomed to the fact that trifles are most important. How soon after did you become engaged to Mr. Greville?"

"Immediately," murmured Sidney.

"And you accepted Mr. Greville, knowing that his heart belonged to Miss Neil?"

"He was very unhappy."

"And you, as an old friend, wished to console him?" he said, the tone in which he spoke taking the sting from his words

"It was not that exactly," she murmured.

"Will you tell me how it was then?"

"Mr. Greville was very hurt and angry, and threatened to be revenged on Miss Neil or—on her—lover, and when I tried to console him, he said, if I would accept him, he would forego his revenge."

"His revenge on Mr. Rutledge?"

"No," Sidney answered low.

"On Miss Neil?"

"No,"—in a lower voice. Then, looking up suddenly, she went on, "There was some mistake," she said bravely. "I did not understand that Mis Neil was engaged to Mr. Rutledge; I thought it was to some one else."

"To whom?"

The question was asked very quietly, without the least eagerness; but his calm exterior veiled strong excitement—her answer meant so much to the keen detective.

"To Mr. Stephen Daunt."

"Any relative of your husband's?"

"My husband," she said faintly.

"Was he then among the lady's admirers?"

"Yes, he admired her. Who could do otherwise? She was most beautiful," the girl said, with a sudden ring of pain in her voice.

"Ah, just so! But still the lady's desire for wealth was great enough to be the principal motive of her [illegible], and she preferred Mr. Rutledge's wealth. I presume it was greater than that of either of her other suitor's."

"I suppose so, then—that is, unless Mr. Daunt had given consent to an engagement between Miss Neil and his son."

"Did Mr. Stephen Daunt seem to feel Mr. Rutledge's success as much as Mr. Greville?"

Sidney half rose in her passionate, almost unbearable pain. It seemed to rend her heart to speak of that time, so

"Yes," she said nervously. "I think it will be wiser not to come here again. I will meet you somewhere, if it is necessary that you should see me."

"One moment," he interposed, suddenly. "Are you a widow?"

She drew back slightly.

"No, certainly not," she said, hastily. "Why do you ask?"

"Your note desired that whoever was sent should ask for Mrs. Daunt. But pray proceed," he sdded, breaking off and leaning forward again, with his old appearance of attention.

"I think it is very likely that there will be no need for me to go into particulars," Sidney faltered rather nervously, raising her beautiful eyes to his with a pathetic look of entreaty. "You will know as much about it as I do myself—perhaps more—when I recall the matter to your memory; you have not forgotten—"

She paused for a moment; her lips were so dry and parched that speech was almost a difficulty then.

"You have not forgotten," she went on more firmly; "the—the — murder which took place here nearly two years ago?"

"The murder, madam?" he echoed, the interest deepening, although some surprise mingled with it at the unexpected word.

"Yes—a gentleman—Mr. Rutledge of Rutledge Hall"—her voice had sunk almost to a whisper—"who was found in his library shot dead."

There was silence for some minutes in the library. The detective's head was leaning on his hand. Sidney was watching him closely.

"I remember perfectly," he said then, lifting his head. "The body was found in the morning by the servants, a gun by its side, bearing the initials of a gentleman in the neighborhood, who disappeared at the time in company with the murdered man's wife."

"Supposed to be in her company," Sidney murmured faintly.

"There was no proof that he was not."

"There was no proof that he was," she said, quickly.

The detective smiled.

"Was there not?" he said coolly. "Well, perhaps not; but it was a likely supposition. The lady was very much younger than her husband, I believe?"

"Yes."

"And very handsome?"—"Very handsome."

"And the gentleman with whom she fled, or with whom she is supposed to have fled, had been in love with her before her marriage?"

"He admired her very much."

"But was not in love with her?" Sidney made no answer,

"Am I to understand so?" he asked quietly.

"I am not likely to be able to judge," she answered, with some unwillingness, "because he was engaged to me at the time."

"Ah!"

Another momentary pause; then the detective leaned forward, putting his hand impressively on the table.

"Mrs. Daunt," he said gravely, "there is an old proverb which bids you tell your lawyer and your doctor the whole truth. dying from a broken heart at his misery; and he has not a friend—not a friend but me, a poor helpless woman, baffled at every turn. Oh, do help us, do help us! You are so clever; you can prove his innocence; and we shall be grateful, so t ankful!"

Her hand was on his arm now, the little trembling jewelled hand, and the beautiful impassioned face was raised to his in earnest entreaty. The keen stern face softened as he gently made her sit down

"I will help you if I can," he said, and used as he was to scenes of distress and suffering, he felt his lip quiver as he heard her passionate, almost incoherent thanks.

"Thank me when I have proved your friend's innocence," he said. "If he is innocent, I will show his innocence to the world, Mrs. Daunt; do not fear. And now to business," he added, changing his tone to one of coolness. "How much of your time can you spare me now?"

She glanced at the clock; it was only five, and the dressing-bell would not ring before seven; but she did not want her absence from the drawing-room to be noticed. She was begining to dread the young barrister's keen inquiring glances, and she almost wished that his visit would come to a close.

"Will an hour be sufficient?" she said timidly. "I dare not remain with you longer, lest my husband should suspect."

"Mr. Daunt is in the house then?"

"Oh, yes! But he is laid up from an accident in the hunting-field. We are safe from interruption."

"I wonder you were not afraid to receive me here?" he said, looking at her in some surprise.

"It was not very prudent, but I could not wait to be prudent," she answered faintly. "And I am my own mistress to a great extent. But I am afraid of incurring my husband's displeasure and arousing his suspicions; he has a firm belief in Mr. Greville's guilt. Will an hour suffice, Mr. Hopgood?"

"Half that time will be sufficient."

"Thank you," Sidney said timidly.

"The first question I wish to ask you is this, Mrs. Daunt. On what terms were you with Mrs. Rutledge?"

"I know her but slightly."

"Before her marriage or after?"

"Both before and after."

"Was she a resident at Ashford, then, fore her marriage?"

"She lived at Lambswold."

"At Lambswold?" he repeated inquiringly. "Is that in this neighborhood!"

"It is Mr. Daunt's residence. She was governess there to his daugher."

"To your husband's daughter?"

"No," Sidney answered, with a faint smile at the thoughs—"to his sister."

"Ah, to his sister! She was a very beautiful person, I believe?"

"Yes, wonderfully beautiful."

"She was likely to have many admirers, I suppose?"

"Yes," Sidney answered slowly.

"Mr. Greville and Mr. Rutledge included?"

"Yes," was the faint reply from the parched pale lips. Sidney was beginning to dread the questions of the detective who sat opposite to her so keen-eyed and impassive.

Sidney half rose in her passionate, almost unbearable pain. It seemed to rend her heart to speak of that time, so full of misery and unrest, to recall her own anguish, her foolish mistake, her passionate useless rebellion against the trouble which had fallen upon her. More than once during the last few minutes she had reproached herself bitterly for ever having undertaken such a herculean task, but the recollection of Frank's misery, so much greater than anything she could conceive, she thought, gave her patience to endure.

"I do not know," she said, struggling desperately for calmness. "Mr. Stephen Daunt went away almost immediately after the engagement was announced, and remained abroad for several weeks."

"And, on his return, did he seem much as usual?"

Sidney hesitated, remembering the added gravity and gentleness of Stephen's manner, and the look on his face which seemed to say that he had seen trouble.

"He was quieter," she answered in a low voice.

"Did he visit at Rutledge Hall?"--"Oh, yes."

"Frequently?"

"I—I think so."

There was a little silence then. Sidney's visitor was bending over his notebook, glancing through it carelessly enough. Sidney sat trembling very much and dreading what he was going to say next; and so intense was her relief when he rose to go that she almost broke down in sobs.

"I need not trouble you any more," he said calmly. "I will bid you good evening Mrs. Daunt. You will hear from me shortly. No, don't ring; I can find my own way out."

Sidney felt as if a heavy load had been suddenly lifted from her heart as the door closed after him, and she drew a long sobbing breath of relief. For a few moments she stood still, then turned and moved towards the door.

As she passed into the hall, Lloyd Milner was standing there, looking grave and thoughtful, his face turned towards the hall door with a look of puzzled bewilderment Sidney's heart seemed to stand still with fear in the terrible dread which struck her. Had he seen—had he recognised her visitor?

He turned to her as she came across the hall towards him.

"I am wondering where I have seen the man who has just gone out of the house," he said carelessly. "Is he a visitor of yours, Mrs. Daunt? His face seems so very familiar."

"Does it? He is my tailor," Sidney answered, with a perfect calm born of her great extremity.

"Your tailor! Indeed! Of course ladies have tailors nowadays. Then I suppose there is a chance likeness, for it is not by any means with a thimble and a goose that I associate him."

THE LATEST CHAMPION.

A Man Who Can Consume a Pound of Tobacco a Day.

We have seen says the Adrian Times, champion wrestlers, champion oarsmen, champion billiardists, champion ballosters, champion roller-skaters, champions of all sorts and sizes, and yesterday we saw the champion tobacco-chewer, Charles Coleman, of Coldwater, known in the locality where he resides as the "tobacco wonder," and we should judge him to be well deserving of the pseudonym. He is a pleasant-looking man of about 24, who bears his honors with a manly consciousness of being unapproached and unapproachable in his particular specialty.

He says he took his first chew of tobacco at the early age of 6 years, liked it from the first, and has continued to use it ever since. He is in the butter, egg, and poultry business, and some time since, when he used to travel around the country picking up the things he dealt in, he says his regular ration of tobacco was a pound a day. He has now got himself down to half a pound a day, and expects to reduce even that low ration. He says he had an easy victory here at the Moreland Brothers & Crane contest, where he masticated two pounds in two days, chewing three hours and a half each day. "Why," said he, with a touch of conscious pride, "I can easily beat anybody I have seen chew here. I can beat any two of them." He says he never experienced any trouble from using such a large quantity of tobacco, except a slight nervousness at times, which he easily controlled. He was examined by medical experts about a year ago, he said, and was told that he need have no fear of contagious disease—that his system was so full of nicotine the disease would have no show. Mr. Coleman says he is always good-natured, happy, and contented, and never cast down or discouraged. He is now the winner in three hard-chewed contests, and wore the medal, which is the insignia of victory, on the outside of his coat. But he says he has had enough of medals, and if he enters any more chews for a prize it must be cash. And he would like to engage in a six-day contest. "I can get backers for any amount," said he.

A MASSACHUSETTS ROMANCE.

A Disowned Child Proven to be the Daughter of a Wealthy Lynn Manufacturer.

A story of a wealthy manufacturer of Lynn is told to-day which not only astonishes his friends, but which is the talk of all the Boston club rooms this evening. The man referred to, while a poor bookkeeper ten years ago, married his present wife. While on their wedding tour a daughter was born. The fact was kept from the knowledge of friends and relatives, and the infant was by an agent placed in the care of a thrifty Irishman. For a year or two the child's expenses were paid by its parents. After that no more money was received, and the woman having charge of the child was unable to get any trace of its parents or relatives. The only clue she had was a handkerchief among the child's clothes bearing some

A JAPANESE RESTAURANT.

It has Been Opened in London at the Health Exhibition.

A Japanese restaurant has been opened at the health exhibition. One who has has dined there writes: Lifting the little saucer-shaped lacquer cover from the soup, and taking advantage of the concession to European prejudices the commissioners have made in providing spoons, instead of obliging him to drink his soup like tea from the bowl, the adventurous diner-out will find that he has before him a savory compound called on the card misoshiru. This is made, as the root-word denotes, from miso, a fermented mixture of soy beans, wheat, and salt. Having disposed of this, he will then, if his appetite is good and his taste gastronomically catholic, attack with pleasurable surprise the many little plats on his tray. With these he will wisely play, turning for relief from the white sweetened haricot beans, mixed with kawatake (a kind of mushroom grown in the shadows of rocky bowlders), and the delicate lobster pudding or cold omelette and other trifles included under the head of kuchitori, to the hachimono, which may happen to be a piece of plump sole stewed in soy. Then for a change he may with the pair of wooden chop-sticks which are laid before him on a bamboo tray, divert himself with trying to pick out of a small china cup, made without a handle, the brown soy-coloured beans, and strips of kikurage, or ear shaped mushrooms. Boiled rice is served in a separate bowl. Another substantial dish, wanmori, consists of meat or fish and vegetables, possibly, for instance, a piece of fresh salmon and a slice of vegetable marrow with pieces of soaked fu, a kind of biscuit made from the glutinous part of wheat flour. The gravy in which these pieces de resistance are floating is thickened with a transparent starchy substance, obtained from the root of a climbing plant (pueraria thunbergiana), called by the Japanese kuzu. For salad there are thin slices of cucumber flavored with scraped shreds of dried bonito, a fish much in favor on the Pacific coasts: the cucumber being dressed with vinegar and sugar, but without oil. One other relish must be noticed, the sliced root of the burdock salted and preserved in miso. A sweet kind of sake, described as Japanese wine, is the proper beverage at the meal which is prepared by cooks from Japan, and served just as it would be in a restaurant in Tokio and without any addition of European dishes.—St. James' Gazette.

The Woodcock's Wooing

Woodcock have certain peculiarities which endear them to the sportsman, as well as make them an interesting study to men of science. Their love-making is essentially their own. Early in the spring the male bird, seeking a mate, repairs to some well-known covert where the females most do congregate. It is just at sunset. All the day long he has been industriously filling himself full of long, luscious worms, and as nightfall comes his bird thought turns to affairs more sentimental. When he reaches the parade ground he looks anxiously around, and if no suspicious noise jars on his sensitive having charge of the child was unable to get any trace of its parents or relatives. The only clue she had was a handkerchief among the child's clothes bearing some initials. She brought up the girl at her own expense, and she is now a very prepossessing young lady. Not long ago she became afflicted with an affection of the eye resembling a cataract. Her guardian took her to an oculist, who became much interested in the case and said that the only one he had ever seen like it was that of Mrs. Blank of Lynn. The Irish woman instantly noticed that the initials were the same as those on the treasured handkerchief. An investigation was begun, and it was ascertained that the poor bookkeeper had become the Lynn manufacturer, worth almost a million. When the facts were presented to him privately, he admitted them, and paid $7,000 for his daughter's bringing up and agreed to allow her $1,500 annually hereafter. The couple have other children, who do not know that they have an elder sister. In the belief that this whole story could be kept quiet, the disowned child is still unacknowledged. The facts as above outlined are becoming so widely known in private circles that it is probable that the names of all concerned will soon be published.

A Mother's Presence of Mind.

Yesterday afternoon Mrs. William Kennedy, who lives on Fourth street, missed her four-year-old son Carl, and in a state of great anxiety made a search for him. Upon approaching the dwelling of Dave Williams she saw people pointing to her little son, who was hanging to a ladder on the windmill tank seventy or eighty feet from the ground. One little hand grasped the ladder, and with the other one he was reaching out to grasp some pigeons that were sitting almost within his reach. The mother realized the awful peril of her little son, but with a heroism seldom seen she called to the child in a firm voice saying, "Come down, Carl, and mamma will give you a peach." The little fellow looked cautiously around over his shoulder, and seeing his mother started to descend, while the group stood with faces upturned, blanched with terror for fear he would lose his hold and be dashed to pieces; but he came safely down, and as he approached the last rounds of the ladder he said, "I am coming, mamma," and the overjoyed mother caught her child in her arms.—[San Jose Herald.

A Difference.

"What's a good remedy for cholera, doctor?" he asked of the family physician.

"Cleanliness and a proper regard for sanitary laws.

"How much is your charge?"

"About $1.50."

He paid the money with the remark:

"You doctors will swindle a man out of house and home."

A little later he met another physician.

"I say, doctor," he remarked, "I wish you would suggest a preventive of cholera, I'm getting a little nervous."

The physician, who knew his man, replied:

"Plenty of good whisky."

"Thank you, doctor, how much is it?"

"Ten dollars."

his bird thoughts turns to affairs more sentimental. When he reaches the parade ground he looks anxiously around, and if no suspicious noise jars on his sensitive ears he begins with a low introductory overture. Then he grows impatient and utters loud, gutteral bleatings, clucking just before each one. Then he struts up and down the mossy bank as if his performance gave him intense satisfaction. Then he considers himself fairly introduced, and, taking wing, rises in the air, flying up in spiral circles, each growing smaller as he ascends. During this flight he utters a low, sweet, cooing note. After sailing about in a series of aerial somersaults, he swoops down to the spot of his starting. For hours he fools about, displaying his wing performances, until at last the female can no longer resist his antics, and throwing coquetry, as Hamlet did the physic, to the dogs, she approaches with ruffled feathers and dishevelled plumage. The two meet and caress each other with every evidence of affection and all the by-plays of love thrown in, and locking their long bills in each other's grasp, as if too happy for earth, they rise straight in the air and fly far out of sight in the darkness.

The Little Savage.

About the time when baby begins to put away monkey manners, and to stand on two feet like a man, he begins to show, in a very marked degree, the characteristics of savage tribes. For two or three years of this part of his life the best baby is a little savage. His ideas of property are intensely savage. He may be said to be always more or less "on the grab." (I object to slang as much as any man, but really there is no other way of describing the tendencies exhibited at this stage of baby's career.) If he has small brothers or sisters (or both), he is always more or less at war with these neighboring savages. If he is deprived of anything he has come to regard as his property (quite mistakenly, it may well be,) or if he sees in the hands of his small kinsfolk any goods or chattels which seem pleasing in his eyes, he has but one way of expressing his wishes; he goes for the possession of the desired object, using his hands as weapons if he has no others handy, but bringing down a stick or brush or book (as the case may be) on the head of his enemy with all the zeal of a Fijian or an Ojibbeway on the war-path. Girl babies are pretty nearly as bad as boy babies in these matters, only the girl savage differs from the boy savage as much as savage woman differs from savage man. Of course, there are many baby boys and baby girls who show little tendency to savagery, just as there have been many uncultured races of man who have been gentle and innocent. But the quiet babies are always weak and unhealthy. In the struggle for existence they succumb before their more ferocious brothers, just as the quiet and gentle savage tribes perish before their tomahawk-flourishing, spear-throwing, club-wielding neighbors.—[Belgravia.

Manganese steel is very dense, tough, and hard. It does not require to be forced or rolled to impart strength to it like most steel. It does not tarnish readily. A magnet does not attract it. When brought to a white heat and plunged in water it turns soft and not hard. Its castings have very few flaws. It is made by pouring from 10 to 12 per cent. of rich ferro-manganese into molten steel and mixing the two together before the alloy is run off into ingots.

A scientific journal reports that a composition of sand, cork, and lime molded into blocks is now on trial in Germany for building light partitions. It is said to have the advantage of excluding sounds better than ordinary brick work, while being light and a good non-conductor. But a composition of hard-wood sawdust applied on lath like common plaster is cheaper than the German method of constructing partitions, is much lighter, and has other desirable qualities.

At one of the August meetings of the Academy of Sciences, Paris, M. E. de Jonxuieres made some remark on the volcanic debris collected on the east coast of the Island of Mayotte, at the northwest end of Madagascar. These fragmenss, which were cast ashore in considerable quantities on May 16, 1884, consisted of pumice, probably from Krakatoa. They appear to have traversed a distance of 3,840 nautical miles in 259 days, at a mean velocity of 14.8 miles a day.

A report submitted by Mr. Milne Home to the Royal Society, Edinburgh, states that at a period geologically recent in the earth's history an arctic climate prevailed in part of Northern Europe, and as an effect of this there occurred local glaciers in Scotland, leaving some of their traces still visible. Subsequently Scotland was entirely submerged beneath the sea, and most of the valleys were filled with sand, gravel, and mud. A northwesterly current prevailed, carrying masses of floating ice with boulders which were deposited on the hills.

The Men Who are Promoted.

The Manufacturer's Gazette, in a recent editorial, made the following statements, regarding young men and their advancement, which others than the class to whom it is addressed will do well to heed:

"The young men who receive promotion are the young men who do not drink on the sly. They are not the young men who are always at the front whenever there is any strike, nor are they the men who watch for the clock to strike twelve, and leave their picks hanging in the air. They are not the men who growl if they are required to attend to some duty a few minutes after the whistle has sounded. They are the men usually who pay the closest attention to the details of their business, who act as if they were trying to work for their employer's interest instead of to beat him at every crook and turn. They are the men who give the closest attention to every practical detail, and who look continually to see whether they can do any better or not. This class of men are never out of a job. They are scarce. They never strike, they never loaf, and they do not ask for their pay two or three weeks before pay day."

Death in the Alps.

Respecting the fate of Prof. Dreikorn, of Mannheim, who toward the end of August set out on a tour in Switzerland, and who soon afterward suddenly disappeared, nothing further could for some time be ascertained, in spite of an unintermittent search in the district where he was last seen. At length, however, the efforts made to trace him have led to the discovery of his body in a deep and lonely valley on the western side of the Widderstein. The deceased had started from Immenstadt for a pedestrian tour through the Westerthal, and thence by way of Schroccen, to the Bregenz forest and Lindau. It is believed that while going over the pass of Gentschel he was overtaken by a heavy fog which caused him to miss the way, branching off from the pass to Hohenkrumbach. He appears to have wandered in the direction of the Berggrund Alp to the western side of the Widderstein. The mountain here makes a precipitous descent, covered here and there with patches of grass and loose rock, and falling between six and seven hundred feet to the bottom of a narrow gorge over which flows the Berggund torrent. On the edge of this abyss the hat and umbrella of the deceased professor were discovered. It is evident that while endeavoring in the thick mist to ascertain whether three was a pathway down the valley at this spot the unfortunate traveler missed his footing, and after slipping down a short grassy slope fell over the precipice from a height of over six hundred feet into the chasm below, where his mutilated and decaying corpse was finally discovered. This is the second fatal accident which has occurred to pedestrian tourists in the same district during the summer of the present year.—[London Standard.

Much Sleep.

The only rule is take enough. Old Mother Means in Eggleston's "Hoosier Schoolmaster" advised her husband when buying cheap land, "While yer a-gettin', get a-plently." So say we in regard to sleep, a full quantity of which is more valuable than the grandest prairie farms the sun ever shone on.

It is during the wakeful hours that the muscles and the nervous system and brain expend their energies. Muscles are partially recruited during the day by nourishment taken, but the great recuperating work of the nerves and brain is done during sleep. Such recuperation must at least equal the expenditure made through the day or else the brain is ill-nourished, wastes, withers. Persons who, in early English history, were condemned to death by being prevented from sleeping, always died raving maniacs. Persons who are starved to death suffer brain starvation also, and pass into hallucinations and then into insanity.

QUADRUPLE TRAGEDY IN NEBRSKA.

A Farmer, his Wife and Child and a Neighbor Found Murdered.

The Hon. W. G. Horne of Fullerton, in Nance county, brings the details of a quadruple tragedy thirteen miles west of that town. The victims are P. G. Percival, his wife and child, and Hugh Myers all English people. They were murdered on Monday night or early on Tuesday morning, and their bodies were not discovered until last night. Percival and his wife and child were shot and Myers was smothered. Percival was a well to-do farmer and well known citizen of Nance county. Mrs. Percival was the daughter of the Rev. G. C. Tanner of Owatonna, Minn., County Superintendent of Schools. Yesterday morning Tom Miller, who had business with Percival, who lives at the head of Horse Creek, went to see him on Wednesday, and before he reached Percival's house he was told by some neighbors that Percival and his folks were not at home, as the house was shut up. Nevertheless, Miller went to the house and rapped on the door. He got no answer, and then returned home.

On Thursday night Miller again went to Percival's house to see if he had returned. He found the door fastened, and thereupon broke it open, thinking that perhaps something might be wrong. He was horrified to find Mrs. Percival dead in bed, she having been shot, and her child lying dead beside her. Mr. Percival was not to be found in the house but Miller soon discovered him lying dead near the hay stack, he, too, having been shot. His body was partly eaten by dogs and wolves. Hugh Myers, his former partner in the cattle business, who had been visiting him, was also found dead on the premises, he likewise having been murdered.

It seems that on Monday last Percival while in Fullerton with his wife and child and Mr. Myers, to do some trading and other business, had in his possession a check for $1,000, which he deposited in a bank and drew $500. The indications were that after putting up his team he was assaulted, killed, and robbed, after which the murderer or murderers went to the house and killed Mrs. Percival and child. It is said that Myers was choked to death or smothered in some way. Two neighbors who are missing are suspected to have been killed, and search is being made for their bodies. They were honest and trustworthy men, and it is not generally believed that they committed the deed, although some people suspect them unless their disappearance is satisfactorily explained. The general belief is that the murders were committed by one man, and that it was done for robbery.

A REMARKABLE BUFFALO HUNT.

A Great Herd Chased Hundreds of Miles and Thousands of Animals Killed.

People living near here, writes a correspondent from Glendive, Montana, were surprised the other day by hearing a loud tramping, and through the clouds of dust kicked up they discovered a herd of buffaloes making at a mad pace for the river.

"No, you're not," said the physician positively, "Your pulse is over a hundred, and in less than two minutes you will be in a cold sweat. You take my advice and go home."

"I—I can't go home. I am resolved to ask old Jones for his daughter's hand to-night, or perish miserably in the attempt."

"Wrong diagnosis," muttered the doctor to himself.

AYER'S
Cherry Pectoral.

No other complaints are so insidious in their attack as those affecting the throat and lungs: none so trifled with by the majority of sufferers. The ordinary cough or cold, resulting perhaps from a trifling or unconscious exposure, is often but the beginning of a fatal sickness. AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL has well proven its efficacy in a forty years' fight with throat and lung diseases, and should be taken in all cases without delay.

A Terrible Cough Cured.

"In 1857 I took a severe cold, which affected my lungs. I had a terrible cough, and passed night after night without sleep. The doctors gave me up. I tried AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL, which relieved my lungs, induced sleep, and afforded me the rest necessary for the recovery of my strength. By the continued use of the PECTORAL a permanent cure was effected. I am now 62 years old, hale and hearty, and am satisfied your CHERRY PECTORAL saved me.

HORACE FAIRBROTHER."

Rockingham, Vt., July 15, 1882.

Croup.—A Mother's Tribute.

"While in the country last winter my little boy, three years old, was taken ill with croup; it seemed as if he would die from strangulation. One of the family suggested the use of AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL, a bottle of which was always kept in the house. This was tried in small and frequent doses, and to our delight in less than half an hour the little patient was breathing easily. The doctor said that the CHERRY PECTORAL had saved my darling's life. Can you wonder at our gratitude? Sincerely yours,

MRS. EMMA GEDNEY."

159 West 128th St., New York, May 16, 1882.

"I have used AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL in my family for several years, and do not hesitate to pronounce it the most effectual remedy for coughs and colds we have ever tried. A. J. CRANE."

Lake Crystal, Minn., March 13, 1882.

"I suffered for eight years from Bronchitis, and after trying many remedies with no success, I was cured by the use of AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL. JOSEPH WALDEN."

Byhalia, Miss., April 5, 1882.

"I cannot say enough in praise of AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL, believing as I do that but for its use I should long since have died from lung troubles. E. BRAGDON."

Palestine, Texas, April 22, 1882.

No case of an affection of the throat or lungs exists which cannot be greatly relieved by the use of AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL, and it will always cure when the disease is not already beyond the control of medicine.

The Peculiarities of Dogs.

The fashion which cites the dog as a better species of human being, and depreciates men as if they were dogs gone wrong, is, as an English author calls it, "Unnatural History." Dogs, he says, are no better than men, and but for man would have been much worse than they are. They are very like men in their exhibition of the lower passions, such as anger, jealousy, fear and vanity.

A bull-terrier, for instance, used to express its anger in accordance with the human precept, "When the boys hits you, hit the post." If a beggar came to the door, the terrier was frantic. Being restrained from flying at the poor man, he would rush out, as soon as released, and attack the gardener. At other times the gardener and the terrier were excellent friends, but the dog, when angry, seemed influenced by the same nature as leads the husband to grumble at his wife's cap, because the morning news is disagreeable.

A dog was jealous of another pet. In the course of time, the pet died, was stuffed and placed in a glass case. Whenever the dog's attention was drawn to his stuffed rival gazing at him with glassy eyes, he always snarled.

A bull-terrier was a whimsical coward. He was ready to fight anything but an Indian-rubber cushion. When that was filled or emptied of air in his presence, he would go into paroxysms of hysterical screaming. The garden-hose filled him with such terror that he could never be coaxed into the garden when it was used, nor would he enter the room where it was kept.

An old setter once displayed such vanity that it was immediately seized upon to compel him to obedience. He would follow the members of the family, whenever they went out, no matter how troublesome his presence might be.

One day, the children tied a ribbon bow on the tip of the dog's tail. Everybody laughed at his comical appearance, which so mortified the poor setter that he retired under the sofa, and sulked for an hour. The next day the family were going to a croquet party, and the dog seemed bent on accompanying them.

It occurred to one of the young ladies to try the effect of a ribbon-bow. It was tied on his tail, and immediately he rushed into the house, and hid under the sofa. When they returned, he was on the door-step, sitting on his haunches as if concealing something, and refrained even from wagging his tail, lest the hated bow should be seen.

A writer, illustrating the fact that the dog is one of man's noblest servants and one of his chiefest triumphs, says:

"In the beginning Allah created man, and seeing what a helpless creature he was, He gave him a dog. And He charged the dog that he should be the eyes and the ears, the understanding and the legs, of the man."

kicked up they discovered a herd of buffaloes making at a mad pace for the river. The animals appeared to be well-nigh run down, but many of them were furious.

As they came to the bank of the Yellowstone they plunged in pell mell one on top of another, and for a time it looked as though many of them would be killed, but nearly all got out uninjured. They had hardly reached the other side when a yelling, swearing crowd of white men and Indians came up on foam-covered horses. They paused there long enough to get refreshments, and then resumed the chase.

There were four or five hundred buffaloes in the herd, and they were making for British America as fast as their legs would carry them. From the hunters it was learned that the hunt began down in Dakota, on the Cannon Ball river, where not less than five thousand of the animals were found grazing. A few of the men had followed the entire distance, but although the party that passed here numbered only thirty, its members estimated that from first to last three or four hundred men had taken part in the slaughter. Some of the men who started out with the original party had remained behind at various points to secure the hides and others, who only joined in for the sport, had dropped out after satisfying themselves with the chase. The rapidity with which these magnificent animals are slaughtered is shown by the fact that the hunters passing through here said they would have the hides of the remnant of the herd before reaching the boundary line.

Probably this is one of the last big buffalo hunts that will ever occur in this country. The Indian, now that he is assured of enough to eat at the agencies, is as reckless in his slaughter of the bison as the white man. He seems to consider the game as nearly extinct, and he goes in recklessly with the idea of having all the sport he can before the end is reached. The wanton destruction of this herd has caused great indignation throughout the entire section traversed, but as it seems to be the policy to exterminate the bison nothing will be done about it.

A Rooster Kills a Rat.

A Franklin square boy has a pair of pet bantams that are bringing up a brood of diminutive-looking chickens which would pass for young quails. In the yard where they stroll and feed, a rat occasionally makes his appearance, looking for something to eat. Recently a fresh-looking young rat, bent upon making a lunch off from one of the chickens, boldly attempted to seize and carry away one of the brood. The little white cockerel did not take the raid kindly, but jumped upon the rat's back, held him down, and pecked him to death. The only unnatural thing about the proceeding was his omission to crow over his victory.—[Norwich Bulletin.

Catarrh—A New Treatment.

Perhaps the most extraordinary success that has been achieved in modern science has been attained by the Dixon Treatment of Catarrh. Out of 2,000 patients treated during the past six months, fully ninety per cent. have been cured of this stubborn malady. This is none the less startling when it is remembered that not five per cent. of the patients presenting themselves to the regular practitioner are benefitted, while the patent medicines and other advertised cures never record a cure at all. Starting with the claim now generally believed by the most scientific men that the disease is due to the presence of living parasites in the tissues, Mr. Dixon at once adapted his cure to their extermination; this accomplished the catarrh is practically cured, and the permanency is unquestioned, as cures effected by him four years ago are cures still. No one else has ever attempted to cure catarrh in this manner, and no other treatment has ever cured catarrh. The application of the remedy is simple and can be done at home, and the present season of the Celebrating Her Hundredth Birthday.

A most interesting birthday party was held in Ernesttown, about about a mile and a half this side of Odessa on Monday last—the celebration of the hundreth anniversary of Mrs. D. C. Smith. There was a large gathering of friends and relatives and the old lady, who was in excellent health and spirits, was the recipient of the warmest congratulations. She was born near the Catskill Mountains, N.Y., and came to Ernesttown, which was then a wilderness, when quite young. She is the mother of nine children, six daughters and three sons. All of the daughters are living and one son. These were all present, besides scores of grand and great-grand children. The old lady looks to be good for several years yet. It may be of interest to state that she has smoked nearly all her lifetime and enjoys a pipe now as much as she ever did.

Ernesttown Court of Revision.

Correspondence of THE EXPRESS.

The final session of the Judge's Court of Revision for Ernesttown was held at Odessa on Monday last, Mr. J. C. Drewry appearing for the Reformers and Mr. W. G. Wilson for the Conservatives. Good work was done and the Reformers are justly proud of the result. A total gain of thirty-eight has been made in the township. As usual, the Reformers of Ernesttown have done themselves credit and deserve and have the thanks of their friends in the county. The assessor has been severely censured for the careless way (to put it mildly) in which he done his work. For example, one of the Burley boys, who has been in Dakota for over two years and who was struck off the list last year, was put on this year. The assessor certainly strained a good many points to "fix" things, and judging from the number of Booths wrongly inserted in the list, "Arny" had something to do with the fixing.

Engagement Extraordinary.

She arrives next week, and will open her American tour in Boston and will —The Grand Trunk has discontinued the dining car service between Toronto and Kingston. In future passengers will have to take "pot luck" at the Cobourg refreshment rooms.

—The lightning express train on the G. T. R., yesterday ran into a freight at Point Claire, near Montreal. The driver of the express was killed, and the firemen and several others badly injured.

—You can get the largest variety of wool and cashmere hose of all sizes and at the right prices at C. F. Henderson's.

—Read Mr. John Blewett's advertisement in another column. This old and reliable house is better prepared than ever to give the best of value in flour, feed, groceries, fish, pork, etc. Give him a call.

—A subscriber in the far west writes:—THE EXPRESS is quite a treat and is anxiously looked for every week." There are hundreds of people nearer home who would also find it is a great treat if they would give it a trial. Only $1 till 1st Jan., 1886.

—We are showing great bargains in ladies' and children's under skirts, knitted, felt and quilted, also the new stripe wincey skirts.
C. F. Henderson.

—"Where is the watering cart?" was the frequent enquiry on Dundas-st., Monday morning. A miniature cyclone prevailed all day and pedestrians' eyes and ears were deluged with dust. It was the worst day of the year. The street committee had blundered in dispensing with the watering cart too early in the season.

—Furniture.—The best and cheapest furniture ever offered in this district is now offered by W. E. Baker, next door to the post office, Market Square.

—A special meeting of the Board of Education was called for Saturday evening last for the purpose of transacting business which should have been attended to at the regular meeting. There was no quorum, however, and consequently nothing was done. Those present were Messrs. A. L. Morden, W. F. Hall, J. Webster, A. McNeil, Jas. Perry and K. J. Strong, and the representative of THE EXPRESS.

—I saw a man that saw a saw that would outsaw any saw you ever saw. He bought the saw and used the saw to saw his saw logs. If you want to see the saw saw go to the Golden Auger. H. W. Perry.

—The Secretary of State at Washington has requested Mr. W. S. Williams, U. S. Counsul at Napanee, to make a collection of products and manufactures for the World's Exposition at New Orleans, which opens on Dec. 1st and closes 1st May. Full information will be given parties, who would like to exhibit, on application to Mr. Williams. The distance is so long and the magnitude of the exposition so great that it is not likely any person here will feel encouraged in making an exhibit.

[illegible] was shown that the owners of the yacht were not the transgressors. The case was adjourned till Saturday when the guilty parties, it is believed, will be ascertained.

—Lindsay had a $3,000 jewelry burglary on Sunday last. The facetious reporter wound up the account by stating that "intense excitement prevailed and a strict watch was placed in the banks, jewellry stores, newspaper offices and other places where large sums of money and other valuables were kept." It is suspected that there was as much as a twenty-five shin-plaster and a three-cent stamp in the safes of the newspaper offices.

—A lecture on "Our Insect Friends and Insect Foes; and their Habitations," will be delivered in the School-room of St. Mary Magdalene's Church on Wednesday evening next at 8 p.m., by Rev. Thos. W. Files, a distinguished member of the American Association for the Advancement of Science. The lecture is very interesting and can be turned to profit by fruit growers and others. It is highly commended by the press of Montreal, where it has been delivered. Admission, 25 cents; children, 10 cents.

—Dr. Brown, formerly of this town, is erecting a brick building on Princess street, Kingston. A few days ago he engaged Messrs. Fred Schryver and Fox, both bricklayers of Napanee, to work on the building and made the former foreman of the works, and allowed them to do the fancy and light work on the building. The Kinstonians working on the building took offence at this and struck Monday morning. They said they were not going to work under a mason from a small town like Napanee. Messrs. Schryver and Newlands then took the contract and engaged a new gang of men and commenced work at noon. The Kingston "kickers" did not make anything by their little strike.

—Thirty hives of bees arrived in town per steamer "India" from Adolphustown on Tuesday and twenty on Wednesday. While en route on the steamer, some of the bees by some means gained their freedom and made matters pretty lively for the passengers for a time. They are the property of Messrs. Dorland & Membery of the Campbell House here and were taken to Mr. Allan Pringle's at Richmond, who will care for them on shares. On the way out, owing to the jolting of the waggon, the bees once more got loose and revenged themselves upon the gentleman in charge, Mr. Anderson, of the Campbell House. The Squire says he is pretty fond of honey, but, in harmony with the antiquated adage, he avers that any undue familiarity with them is not calculated to enhance his admiration for the insects.

— he directors of the Mechanics' Institute have engaged and fitted up rooms over Mr. W. D. Madden's book store, where the library and reading room is now located. The rooms are commodious and well adapted for the purpose. Entrance can be made through the book store or direct from Dundas Street by the stairway. The librarian is Mr. W. S. Busby who will make a most efficient and obliging officer. A meeting was held in the rooms Wednesday night at which the evening classes were arranged. The class for drawing and geography will be conducted by Mr. F. F. Miller, C. E., on Monday evenings; that for book-keeping and business correspondence by Mr. J. B. McGuin, on Wednesday evenings; and arithmetic and mensuration, by Mr. Bowerman, on Friday evenings. The classes will open next week. As the tuition is free we trust the young mechanics of the town will become members of the Institute and avail themselves of the advantages of the classes. The re-organized institute promises to do a good work.

[illegible] for her a name which is scarcely less renowned. She arrives next week, and will open her American tour in Boston and will next visit Montreal and other eastern Canadian cities, after which she will proceed west to Toronto and London, taking in the important towns and cities en route. The members of the Union have assumed a great risk in securing so great a treat for the people of this section and their enterprise should be rewarded by a large audience The following are a few of the many flattering press notices Miss Maryatt has received from the leading journals of England:—

Miss Marryat at once appeals to the sympathy of her audience, and exhibits great dramatic and elocutionary power.—London Morning Post.

Florence Marryat has a commanding presence and a fine voice, is perfectly self-possessed, and her elocutionary and dramatic ability is of a very high order.—London Graphic.

"Love Letters" is a most amusing production and was greatly enjoyed by the audience. Remarkably humerous, it kept the audience for the greater part of the time convulsed with laughter. Miss Marryat has a remarkably fine voice.—Liverpool Daily Post.

Amusement Notes.

—Prof. McDonald closed his dancing school last evening with an assembly. He goes to Montreal where he will organize classes in the Queen's Hall during the winter.

—"Only a Farmer's Daughter" attracted a large audience at high prices to the Opera House, Tuesday night. The play itself is below mediocrity, but the company made as much of it as was possible. Miss Lilian Lewis presents a fine appearance, has an excellent voice and good forensic talent. The entertainment was on the whole disappointing.

—Baker and Farron appear in the Opera House Saturday evening in "The Emigrants." These inimitable comedians are sure to draw a large audience and to send everyone away delighted. The plan is now open at J. J. Perry's drug store.

—Mr. Ragan will this evening give his popular lecture on "Paris, the Beautiful," in the Town Hall, under the auspices of the Mechanics' Institute. The lecture will be illustrated with magnificent views. Mr. Ragan's tours are of a high literary and artistic character and should be well patronized.

OBITUARY.

The Late Mrs. S. Stevens.

It is with deep regret we would record the death of Mrs. S. Stevens, a brief notice of whose decease appeared in the columns of our last week's issue. Mrs. Stevens had for a number of years past resided with her mother, the late Mrs. Briggs, of South Napanee, and during that time had been a devout member of the Eastern Methodist church and a teacher in the Sunday School until unable, from illness, to continue her labors. The large number present on Wednesday last, the interesting nature of the funeral services and the beautiful floral decorations of the church served to show the esteem and affection in which the deceased lady was held. One son and two daughters mourn the loss of a most affectionate mother.

The Late Mrs. McGillivray.

Yesterday morning, Nancy, relict of the late Wm. McGillivray, Esq., died at her residence after an illness of several months. The deceased lady was an old resident and highly esteemed. Her only child was Mrs. William Miller of this town, who survives her. The funeral takes place this afternoon at two o'clock.

No Matter.

No matter where pain, lamenets or soreness exists, Hagyard's Yellow oil taken or applied will give immediate relief, and a positive cure quickly follows its use.

THE CAMPBELL HOUSE.

Our Representative Pays a Visit to this Hostelry and Inspects the Additional Accommodation for guests — Superb Appointments — Elegance and Comfort.

Since taking possession of the Campbell House on the 1st of August last, Messrs. Allison, Dorland & Membery have shown a commendable spirit of enterprise in the determination to keep a house superior to any that can be found in any other town of similar size in the province, and thanks to the energy and outlay on the part of Mr. A. McNeil, the owner of the building, they have been enabled to present to the exceedingly numerous and increasing travelling public a house which is a credit at once to the town, the hosts and the owner.

Learning that work on the additions to the hotel had been almost completed and that soon everything would be in readiness for the reception of guests in the recently erected portion, our representative stepped into the Campbell House on Wednesday and was most courteously shown through the entire building by Mr. Allison, the senior partner. On the ground floor of the west wing we came first to the elegantly fitted barber shop, run in connection with the house by Mr. Lester A. Scott. Everything in this shop is new, the seats being of the most modern and unique design, and the chairs in which the subjects of the facial operations are handled with such ambidexterous facility are easy and comfortable. From this excellent tonsorial parlor a door opens into a wash-room, furnished with three bowls of the best material and supplied with water from a tank on the roof. From hence we entered a spacious room intended to be used as a private reading-room for guests. Near here also are the closets which are fitted up well, and near them is a force-pump, which supplies water to the tank on the roof from a large cistern in the basement. Passing out of the reading-room and along a hall we enter the billiard room. This apartment is 26 × 46 feet, with a ceiling 16 feet high, and is lighted by two large plate-glass windows. It is intended to place four first-class tables in this room for the use of devotees of the game. In the north wing are eight large well-lighted sample-rooms—a boon which will be highly appreciated by the many commercial travellers who stay at the Campbell House while in town.

The number of rooms is now in all 44,—22 being in the old part and 22 in the new. The latter are being supplied with fine new walnut furniture from the factory of Messrs. Gibbard & Son, and are well carpeted, over 1,000 yards of new and excellent carpets being utilized, aside from a large quantity of oil-cloth in the halls and closets, and are lighted by gas. In every room is a bell connecting with the office, while in the hall on the first flat is a speaking-tube which is connected with the bar-room, in order that "medicine" and other requisites may be the more conveniently ordered and more expeditiously obtained. At the three arches in the halls of each of the flats are iron, fire-proof doors, which are calculated in case of fire to confine the consuming element to the immediate section in which it originates and thus save an immense amount of property and probably life from the ravages of a conflagration which would otherwise ensue. On the first flat, too, are closets and a well-appointed bath-room. In the south-west corner, also, is a private parlor for guests, which is furnished in keeping with the rest of the house, and is supplied with a fine piano.

The house is now one of the best that can be found in any town in the Province, and is well worthy the extensive patronage it —Mrs. and Miss Mackie of the Dominion House, Belleville, were at the Campbell House, on Wednesday. They made a very large purchase of carpets during the afternoon, the total amount of which, we understand, reached over $100. This circumstance speaks volumes for Napanee as a purchasing point.

—John Smith, a well-to-do farmer, living outside Deseronto, has been arrested for forgery. In 1876 he forged a note on his brother for $600. He has been taken to Shannonville.

—The manager for Mr. Sutherland, lumberman, of Belleville, left here for Belleville, seriously disposed. Only a week ago he was hauling logs over the tramway, in good health. His family physician has but little hopes of his recovery.

—Mr. Fred Kenyon and sister are the guests of Amos Spencer.

—At Flinton, on the 20th inst, by the Rev. Mr. Brown, Mr. George Deline, formerly of Richmond, to Miss Essa Blanche, second daughter of Mr. A. P. Wickware, of this place. No cards. Among the many friends, the writer extends his warmest congratulations, wishing the happy couple every felicity, trusting their only troubles may be "little ones."

—The Scott-Snider hunting party returned on the 25th ult., on their route to Napanee, from Plevna. Some five deer were the spoil.

Odessa.

[Correspondence of THE EXPRESS.]

—Every room in our village is occupied, and inquiries are made daily for tenements and business places to let.

—We very much need a tailor, and last week one Mr. Buchanan, said to be a first-class man, searched diligently for a place to set up business but found every place taken up.

—Among the latest arrivals is Mrs. Seeley, whose name has been prominently before the public in connection with a case recently tried in Kingston.

—Prof. Hodge gave an entertainment in the town hall on Friday evening last, which was well attended.

—Our municipal fathers have at last displayed some regard for the aesthetic and have thoroughly renovated the town hall. The audience room has been enlarged, a new ceiling put on and thoroughly painted throughout. It now has a very pleasing appearance.

—Last Sunday morning a memorial service was held in the church here, when reference was made to Ida and Harry, the deceased children of Mr. E. Clark, who were buried recently, both on the same day.

—The quarterly meeting of the Odessa Circuit will be held here next Sunday morning. The Quarterly Board will meet on Tuesday afternoon, Nov. 4.

—The Odessa Lodge, I. O. G. T., will hold an open temple in the Town Hall, on Tuesday evening, Nov. 4th.

—Dr. Meacham left here on Monday last to lay the petition for the submission of the Scott Act in this county before the Government. It was understood that the Rev. M. L. Pearson would accompany him.

Napanee Mills.

[Correspondence of THE EXPRESS.]

—Mr. Ward, agent for the Map of Ontario, published by Mr. Carter, of Toronto, visited Napanee Mills on Tuesday, and exhibited his map to the teachers and one of the trustees. The map is a good one and seemed accurate enough, except that the territory lately awarded to Ontario was not given on the map itself but printed in one corner along with a small map of After considerable wrangling the Yarker men threw out the bait to Colebrook that if they would support the by-law a station would be built half way between the two places. Colebrook swallowed the bait and agreed to help and the by-law was carried. At that time the line was surveyed to run nearly a mile from Yarker and a half mile from Colebrook, and except at Galbraith's Crossing the station would not have been near either place. Yarker men by giving a bond to the company of $4,000 to secure them against loss, had the line changed to its present position, which has altered the position of placing the stations far from the leading roads of travel and making a station at Yarker a necessity to accommodate the travelling public. Mr. Rathbun, in order to satisfy the Colebrook people, offered to build them a comfortable station at Galbraith's Crossing, which would be the best place for their accommodation, but they refused. To meet the the requirements of the by-law a station has been built half way between the two places, and if not used it can be made a section house. Colebrook's honest poet can now give Chapter 3 by copying another's brain work, without acknowledging the author.

Moscow.

[Correspondence of THE EXPRESS.]

—The Yarker correspondent is not satisfied with upholding the Yarkerites in their malignity and strategem with the Colebrook people in regard to the station, but has opened fire on Moscow just because it possessed a director with a little too much wit and influence for them, and didn't get the "grand bounce," as their director did. We don't think Mr. Rathbun desires any advice, especially from the Yarker correspondent, as to whom he will give the g. b. He is a man of good sense and saw long ago who deserved the g. b., and gave it, too. We would advise our Yarker friend to be a little careful how he attacks our directors, as we well know he has been previously attacked by the Yarkerites and they have always got trapped.

—Mr. Samuel Syke being the only shoemaker in town, is doing a rushing business. Rumour says he will take a partner soon. It's all right, Sam.

—Messrs. Benjamin and O'Loughlin, of Yarker, and Mr. VanLuven, of this place are buying barley at the station; very little has been bought yet.

—A large and convenient coal shed has been erected here.

—The population of our little hamlet has been augmented by some new families lately.

—Mr. Hiram Johnston is making preparations to build a grand brick residence next year. Ah, Hiram what next!

—The missionary meeting was held on Monday night last but on account of the storm was poorly attended.

Correspondence of THE EXPRESS.]

THE HUNTERS' RETURN.—Mr. Peter Amey, proprietor of the Bay View House, returned on Tuesday from Gull Lake, in the Township of Clarendon, with five fine deer, the result of one week's work on the hunting grounds. He was accompanied in his expedition by Capt. Jack Miller, a noted hunter of the interior, to whom he is very much indebted for the quantity of game bagged on this occasion. The "king of the forest," a magnificent buck weighing 256 pounds, was captured by Mr. Amey after an exciting chase on Gull Lake. He was first discovered towards the middle of the lake, swimming in true Boynton style against wind and current. Mr. Amey jumped into his little boat and started in pursuit, and after an hour's hard pulling, he had gained sufficiently on him to send a ball across his bow, which instead of stopping his lead added impetus to his movements, and he spurted "a la Hanlon," and left his pursuer far behind. It was some minutes before Mr. Amey could regain his lost ground.

Sharbot Lake.

NOTES.—Messrs. David Taggart and Norman Switzer are home from Oso on a short visit.—There are three operators engaged at the depot.—Several deer have been killed this fall.—John Docil killed a bear last week which weighed 78 pounds and William Harrison one that weighed 250 pounds.—The boys are catching lots of salmon.—Mr. Newlands, of Kingston, is finishing Gen. Aspinwall's cottage.

CHURCH DEDICATION.—The dedicalion of St. James' Roman Catholic Church, at Sharbot Lake, took place on Wednesday. Low Mass was celebrated by Rev. Father Twohey, and His Lordship Bishop Cleary delivered an able address. The little church, which will seat about 400 people, was filled. At the close of the services a collection was taken up and the neat little sum of $130 was subscribed. The bishop appointed Rev. Father Kelly, of Kingston, parish priest.—Whig.

Stella—Amherst Island.

[Correspondence of THE EXPRESS.]

—Notwithstanding the gale of Monday, the Hero got to Stella safely but lay here for the day, giving the crew a chance to see their friends once more before the season closes.

—The dairy is closed at last after a very successful season, but they have not got all the cheese shipped although they are all made.

—I see your Ernestown correspondent says barley is going to go up. I wish it would start soon, for it is getting late in the season—only one more month to come and go and winter is here.

—The missionary meeting in the Presbyterian Church was a success. Mr. Coulthard gave an eloquent address on missions, and although it is generally a dry subject, he made it very interesting for an hour.

—The first meeting of our dancing school was more than successful, thirty-four members joining and others still to join. Next meeting, Nov. 6th, Thanksgiving Day, I guess we will give thanks in music and dancing.

—If Stella's vote will kill the Scott Act they may as well withdraw the petition to the Government for an election, and let things go on as they are.

—If it was known who spat on that young lady's dress the evening of the dancing class, there would be hot times for a little while.

—No mail Saturday or Monday on account of the high winds. Oh, that we had a telegraph!

DANIEL.

Centreville.

[Correspondence of THE EXPRESS.]

—There, girls, didn't we say that he would be back again?

—The days are now in the "sere and yellow leaf."

—Miss Ida Lucas, of Moscow, has been spending a week with Miss Grace Long.

—Miss Laura Somerson of Newburgh, spent Wednesday with Miss Willie Vrooman of this place.

—Master Harold Miller, son of Mr. J. S. Miller, has been dangerously ill with diphtheria, but under the skilful treatment of Drs. Beeman and Ruttan, is slowly recovering. There have been some other light attacks of the disease in the village but all are now convalescent.

—The residents of the village were gladdened one day last week by the return of Mrs. and Miss Ash from visiting their brother, Mr. Cyrus Ash, who is doing a rushing business in Hastings village.

—Mrs A. Jones, of Centreville, has been spending a few days in Napanee.

—The zeal and enterprise of some of our most influential men in the church, is shown by the handsome new iron fences around two of the grave yards, which have just been completed at a cost of $150. The appearance of the yard is very much improved by the erection of three very handsome monuments.

—The second social under the auspices of the Ladies' Aid Society, was held at Mr. Charles Wagar's, and was a grand success, Tamworth, Enterprise, Moscow and Yarker being well represented. Receipts, about $13, which are to go map to the teachers and one of the trustees. The map is a good one and seemed accurate enough, except that the territory lately awarded to Ontario was not given on the map itself but printed in one corner along with a small map of Ontario and marked, "disputed territory." Mr. Lasher, trustee, made the remark that maps would soon be published assigning the said disputed territory to its correct position in North-Western Ontario, on the same scale as this map of Ontario, at which this encyclopoedia of knowledge (Mr. Ward) said it would be impossible to do so as a map with the disputed territory and Ontario proper upon it, on the same scale as the one he represented, would have to be seven times as long as the said map of Ontario alone, or about 35 feet. Then came a disagreement between the teacher and the agent at to the size the map should be, when Mr. Ward measured off seven lengths of his map, or tried to do so, but could not find enough counter. Mr. Stratton tried to explain to him that the map would only have to be a trifle more than as long again, when the agent called him a fool, and told him he did not know anything, and indulged in such slang as, "He's a smarty; he's one of the smarty's." Now, Mr. Editor, if the said disputed territory takes up six times as much space on the map as Ontario would take on the same scale, should not Hon. Mr. Mowat, who gained it for Ontario, be carried around upon the hands of the people and held up to future generations as the champion of Ontario's rights instead of being allowed to go with only a public demonstration of his popularity. We hope to meet Mr. Ward, this paragon of knowledge, again.

Yarker.

[Correspondence of THE EXPRESS.]

—Corporate bodies, they say, have no souls. It was the first time we were made aware that employees were not possessed of any when that precious epistle appeared in your paper from the telegraph agent at Harrowsmith. He cares nothing about what suffering is caused by blunders made by operators, but he is very anxious that the public should not know it. He denies that the error was made. This denial will not alter the facts, but it directs suspicion more clearly to the Harrowsmith office from the fact that at Harrowsmith there is a loup line leading to Colebrook and Yarker which is sometimes used to send messages, but not very often. The operator at Sharbot Lake states that he sent the message as he received it from Dr. Cannon, that Herbert was better. The message was received by the operator at Kingston that Herbert was dead. The question is, where was the change made? What particular knowledge has the operator at Harrowsmith that the line was open through to Kingston? Let us hear the facts. This is not the only mistake that has been made nor are satisfactory explanations given by the heads of the company. Many people have lost confidence in this mode of communication with friends, and if necessary I can give several mistakes made that have caused inconvenience and trouble to several parties.

—The first accident occurred on Saturday, when the 4 o'clock down train struck a two-year-old heifer belonging to Charles Emberly, the engine lifting her from the track and killing her instantly. No other damage was done. His land is on both sides of the track, and his gates, which were put on by the Company, appear to have been left open, and thus the cow got on the track. There are others who should take warning, for the engineer is greatly annoyed by cows on the track.

—The C. M. Church was comfortably heated on Sabbath, to the satisfaction of all present. New drums and pipes have been put in by W. Drury, tinsmith, and he has accomplished the heating of the church without causing smoke, to the discomfort of the congregation.

—George McDonald is doing a rushing business buying grain and shipping it by the N. T. & Q. Railway. He is securing most of the grain around Moscow, Colebrook and Clark's Mills.

—Mr. Henry Ashley gave a party Monday evening to welcome his son-in-law, Rev. Mr. Jones. Among the guests were Dr. and Mrs. Cannon and Mr. and Mrs. H. Cambridge.

—Mr. G. D. Hawley, M. P. P., was in our village Tuesday and went away by the evening train.

—John Bredin of Kingston, was here Tuesday taking a view of our village. He was surprised at the progress made.

—Mrs. Furz of Violet, was the guest of H. Cambridge on Sunday.

—Mrs. W. Drury of Kingston, visited friends here Sunday.

—J. Crumbley, A. C. Scott's baker, has left for Michigan.

—Miss Scott, of Newburgh, returned home on Saturday after a week's visit.

—I will give your readers a short chapter of the Colebrook and Yarker dispute: The township by-law granting a bonus to the railway company, was defeated on the first vote. To secure its passage a little electioneering was done, and the Yarker men do not profess to be saints, so they set to work to secure the co operation of Colebrook, which was hostile to the road. send a ball across his bow, which instead of stopping his lead added impetus to his movements, and he spurted "a la Hanlon," and left his pursuer far behind. It was some minutes before Mr. Amey could regain his lost ground, but when he did and had levelled his rifle for the second time and fired, the deer was seen to waver in his course, as if wounded; a third shot however, settled the business for him, and Mr. Amey had the proud satisfaction of lassoing and conveying him safely to land. This fine animal will remain on exhibition at the Bay View House for a few days, in order that those desirous of beholding one of the monarchs of the forest, may view his remains.

RESULT OF ADVERTISING.—Mr E. McKenty reports a boom in business since the issue of his celebrated advertisement, offering all kinds of goods at prices reaching way down below zero. He declares now that there is a balm in Gilead, and that balm is printers' ink.

—Mr. F. H. Priest is doing an immense trade through the county. He keeps two teams constantly on the road supplying the farmers with goods in his line. He is deserving of much credit for placing the price of bread at 10c. per loaf, in advance of any other dealer in the county. This is a step in the right direction and worthy of being recorded.

TEMPERANCE.—Mr. McMurray delivered a lecture on this well worn subject, at the town hall on Friday evening last, to a house well filled with lovers of the cause. The Bath choir, under the able leadership of Mrs. C. L. Rogers, furnished the music for the occasion. The lecturer complimented them very highly for their efficiency and expressed himself as delighted with the selections which had been so ably rendered.

PERSONAL.—The Misses Stella and Maud Walker, daughters of Sidney Walker, Esq., of Odessa, and Miss Linter of Kingston, were the guests of Miss May Rogers on Tuesday last. They visited the different places of interest in and around our cozy little town and expressed themselves well pleased with their visit.

Newburgh.

[Correspondence of THE EXPRESS.]

—Mr. McMurray, the celebrated Canadian temperance orator, delivered a telling address on Wednesday evening to a large audience. He dwelt on the superiority of the Scott Act over the Dunkin Bill and spoke very forcibly on the ruin intemperance had wrought on the brightest and best in the land. On Sunday morning and evening he addressed large congregations in the Methodist Church. In the afternoon he gave a very excellent address to the Sabbath School children, and a large number of parents, visitors to the school. Monday evening he delivered a very laughable and comical lecture on Wit, Humor and Humorists, and gave many specimens of native English, Irish, Scotch and American wit and humor. He awarded the palm of victory to the son of Erin. The proceeds were something over $10. Mr. McMurray is a fine speaker and writer and has a keen sense of the humorous and ridiculous. We bespeak for him a large house wherever he goes. His lecture stood the test.

—It is reported that the cheese factory here will close in a couple of weeks.

—Mr. Thomas Scott has bought the right and title of the celebrated feather cleaner, and will make the feathers fly this winter.

—Mr. Ed. Madden is re-shingling his drive house and stable.

—Mr. Stephen Hill returned home last week for the winter.

—The coal at the station is selling very fast.

—The telegraph poles on the N. T. & Q. RR. are set up as far as Newburgh.

—Mrs. Jackson, an elderly lady and a highly respected resident of this vicinity, died on Thursday and was buried on Saturday in the Methodist Cemetery. Rev. A. Elliott, B. A., conducted the services at her late residence.

—Miss Coutts Burdett, who has been very low for some weeks past, is now convalescent.

—Rev. Mr. Briden, who has been prostrated during the past week, is slowly improving.

—Mrs. Wm. Nugent has gone west to visit relatives and friends in the vicinity of Peterboro and Port Hope.

—Mr. Burdett's new building on Main Street, is progressing very fast to completion. It will be both useful and ornamental to our village. He is about the only man of an enterprising turn in the place. He builds good commodious dwellings for his tenants and is sure to keep them for a long time. We never heard of a tenant moving from one of his houses to another in the village.

—A hotel keeper in our town who is not in the habit of buying his bread from our village baker, presented him with a number of his bread tickets which he had taken over his bar for whisky. Who would not vote for the Scott Act?

—Mr. Carsallen, of Napanee, has rented Mr. Burdett's hall for a roller skating rink.

EYE OPEN.

Freeman's Worm Powders are safe in all cases. They destroy and remove Worms in children or adults.

—The second social under the auspices of the Ladies' Aid Society, was held at Mr. Charles Wagar's, and was a grand success, Tamworth, Enterprise, Moscow and Yarker being well represented. Receipts, about $13, which are to go towards furnishing the parsonage. The Centre-villians indulged in rather a primitive way of getting there, about twenty-five going in a lumber wagon. However, they were a jolly load, and they didn't get home till morning. The horses seemed to have the easiest time of it as they stood still in the road most of the time, the driver being so absorbed in entertaining the young ladies of the party that he forgot his duty, or perhaps he was moon struck.

—The ladies of the Methodist Church have re-organized a Ladies' Aid Society and propose holding several socials with the view of raising money for the parsonage. The first was held at Mr. E. J. Williams', Tuesday, 21st, and the second at Mr. C. Wagar's on the 28th. The next one will be given by Misses Ash, Shorey and Callary, and will be held at the residence of Miss Ash on November 25th. All are invited.

LITERARY NOTES.

Popular Science Monthly.

The 26th volume of this popular magazine opens auspiciously with the November number, which contains a number of very interesting and able papers. In the leading article on "The Relations between Mind and the Nervous System," Dr. W. A. Hammond defines mind as a force developed by gray nerve tissues, and maintaining that this force is generated wherever in the living organism, gray-nerve tissue is found. Some of Dr. Hammond's conclusions in this article are at variance with the teachings of Phrenology. In this number Herbert Spencer very ably replies to Frederic Harrison as to the "Origin of Synthetic Philosophy." "Pending Problems of Astronomy," by Prof. C. A. Young, and "What is Electricity?" by Prof. John Trowbridge, are two interesting addresses given at the recent meeting of the American Association. On the "German Testimony on Classics Question" Mr. F. A. Fernald has a very interesting paper, showing the German testimony is not all on one side and outlining the course of study demanded by the Modernists. "The future of the Negro in the South," by J. B. Craighead; "Drowning the Torrent in Vegetation," by S. W. Powell; "Chilian Volcanoes, Active and Extinct," by Karl Ochsenious; "The Chemistry of Cookery," by W. Mattieee Williams; "Domestic Arts in Damaraland," by Rev. C. G. Butner; "The Oil Supply of the World" and a "Sketch of Prof. James Hall" are all interesting articles. The Editor in his usually vigorous and trenchent style comments on the Philadelphia meeting of the American Association, the Spencer-Harrison controversy, and the contrast between Words and Things in education, the reality of which has recently been denied by Prof. Porter. Seasonable Hints.

Nothing but the best and sweetest of food should be given to a flock of laying hens at this season of the year, because if they should stop laying when cold weather sets in, it would be very difficult to get them to lay again until after the first of January.

The time is approaching when every breeder should see that his fowls are provided with green food for winter use. Fowls as well as other animals require a certain amount of coarse and refuse matter to keep them free from constipation, indigestion and other kindred complaints. Before winter sets in, stow away cabbage, turnips, rowen, onions, and potatoes for the fowls.

There are points about hens moulting that ought to be better understood than they now are. It takes them nearly three months to go entirely through the process. When this begins they are generally sent to market, and unless the pullets are early, and begin to lay before winter sets in, they will probably not begin laying before spring, and the egg crop will be short. A better way is, to feed the hens well when moulting, and as all do not moult at one time, some eggs may be obtained nearly, or quite all through that trying period. By a judicious mode of feeding, connected with a little stimulating food, we may bring them through and put them in a fix to lay and develope a good coat of new feathers before cold weather sets in. Thus the chances will be that, if properly housed, a supply of eggs will be had all winter. From this course may be gained two advantages: Eggs are had in the winter when they command the highest price, and the hens will be the first to sit in the spring just when the good housewife or professional poulry keeper is most anxious to have the hens do that very thing. Hens which have passed the age of usefulness and those which put off moulting into cold weather should be sold as soon as the facts are known. There is no profit in such; let them go.—[American Stock Breeder.

Feeding Milch Cows.

Three times a day will suffice--early in the morning, mid-day, and at night. An exception to this may, however, be made, in the very long nights in winter. At this season a fourth feed to supper up with will be necessary, as the nights being so long too much would otherwise have to be given at the evening meal. Of course, such things as extra cake, &c., would be dealt out at the other feeding times. The cows should be so fed that a clean manger is always found when supplying the following meal. Water, too, should be allowed ad libitum with each meal. The feeding of beasts little and often may be carried out too far, as visiting them too often disturbs them in their necessary rest. Neither is it a good plan to be constantly pressing food upon them. Intervals to chew the cud and digest their food are demanded by nature. Some proper foods are sweet meadow hay, given partly long and partly chaffed, with some oat or barley straw mixed with pulp carrots, or cow cabbage, whichever are the more foods are sweet meadow hay, given partly long and partly chaffed, with some oat or barley straw mixed with pulp carrots, or cow cabbage, whichever are the more easily obtained, and from one to two gallons of scalded bran per day. A little mixed cotton or linseed cake every day would also improve the condition of the animal and the quality of the milk. Oats, too, are an excellent and cheap milk producer, if some of the above food cannot be obtained. Oats, however, should be crushed, or they would not be digested by all animals.

Fall Ploughing.

Joseph Harris thinks that farm horses can be put to no better use in autumn than pulling the plough. In the September Agriculturist he says: "There is nothing pays so well as fall ploughing, and getting land ready for spring ploughing. The longer I live the more I am impressed with this fact. I say nothing on the disputed question in regard to breaking up sod land in the autumn. It is possible, as some claim, that there is a loss from drainage. But if anyone will plough my land in the fall, I will run the risk. But what I have specially in mind is, land not occupied with any crop—corn land, potato land, bean land, stubble land and weed land. Stick in the plough if you can spare the time; if not, harrow or cultivate. Better still, do both. Light, sandy land, ploughed and prepared in the autumn, can be sown in the spring without ploughing. Heavy land, if ploughed and worked in the fall, may need ploughing again in the spring, but the work will be easier and the land better. Keep the horses busy until the snow flies. But the earlier the work is done the better. One ploughing while the land is dry is worth two ploughings when it is wet."

Onions.

Onions require a warm, light soil, such as is found in Spain and Egypt. The Spanish onion can almost be eaten without any condiments, but let any one try the same experiment with our Whethesfield, or other species of onion. The rank flavor is overpowering. To grow fine delicate onions, choose light warm soil and encourage a very rapid growth. We cannot, however, except in a few specially favored localities, grow onions equal to those of Spain, but we can grow better ones than those usually sent to market. For cooking purposes, the strong flavored onion may answer to the majority of persons, but the proper way to eat an onion is to eat it raw. I have eaten them thus in Spain with oil and bread and found them palatable. But I never could go their garlic.

Selecting a Milch Cow.

The best sign for richness of milk is a deep orange color inside the ears. Such is said to be infallible, but there are accompanying points that assist the expert in making this selection from a number. After examining the ears, feel the skin on the rump, and observe that it should be soft, velvety, and fall again to its position when the hand is removed. The hair should be fine and silky, with a yellowish cast underneath. The milk veins should be very prominent, large and uniform in well balanced, extending full to the rear, and well forward in front. The bones should be fine, the eye mild and expressive, the body showing a tendency to avoid accumulating fat, the teats even and at regular intervals, with the escutcheon well defined, dandruff being easily rubbed therefrom, and the cow should be not only a good feeder but a good drinker also.

Fodder.

I often read in the agricultural press advice as to economy of fodder, and paragraphs are frequently met with wherein the farmer is advised to feed beet tops, or cabbage leaves, instead of allowing them to waste. Putting aside the fact that corn fodder or other green crops can be grown so cheaply, I question very much whether cabbage leaves are food for cattle; they flavor the milk, unless fed after milking, and at no other time. Beet or mangold leaves are good feed, but I would rather let the cows wander through the field and help themselves than bother cutting them for them. This I have done, and though I cannot go so far as to say it was a benefit to the root crop to be shorn of a few of its leaves, I know no injury was done.

Ghost Story from the Far East.

A correspondent in Canton sends us the following story for the Spiritualists from the Marshall Islands: "The end of last year, or the beginning of this, an American ship, the Ranier, was wrecked on these islands, and about twenty men found refuge on them. But their number being too large for their supply of provisions, it was agreed that they should separate. The captain caused a small 20-ton schooner to be built of the remains of the wreck, and, taking ten of the crew and a share of the provisions, sailed away for another island of the group, about 300 miles off. The rest of the crew was left in charge of the first mate—a son-in-law of the captain. The second mate was sent off to make his way to Saigon and appeal for aid. This he did, finally reaching Hong Kong, when the United States corvette Essex was dispatched to the rescue, carrying the second mate as a guide. Meanwhile the King of the island on which the shipwrecked men were, who was kind and friendly to them, was full of forebodings as to the fate of the captain's party, and the second mate said they would never see them again, and so on. But one day he came with different tidings. It seems he was in the habit of holding spiritual communion with his dead wife, by name Olivia. In one of these seances he had, I suppose, asked her if she could give him any tidings, any hopes for his shipwrecked friends. She said that on a Sunday a sail would be seen, and they would be rescued. The King brought these news with great joy to the refugees, and with some curiosity they awaited the result. This must have been some four months after they were wrecked. Sure enough, on the following Sunday a sail was seen, but in spite of their efforts to attract attention the ship passed on her course. But the Sunday after that, the rescuing ship, the Essex, appeared in sight, and eventually took them all off. This story was related by an officer of the Essex to a friend of mine, who at once

FROM THE SON: "28 Cedar St., New York, Oct. 28, 1882.

"Gentlemen: My father resides at Glover, Vt. He has been a great sufferer from Scrofula, and the inclosed letter will tell you what a marvelous effect has had in his case. I think his blood must have contained the humor for at least ten years; but it did not show, except in the form of a scrofulous sore on the wrist, until about five years ago. From a few spots which appeared at that time, it gradually spread so as to cover his entire body. I assure you he was terribly afflicted, and an object of pity, when he began using your medicine. Now, there are few men of his age who enjoy as good health as he has. I could easily name fifty persons who would testify to the facts in his case.

Yours truly, W. M. PHILLIPS."

FROM THE FATHER: "It is both a pleasure and a duty for me to state to you the benefit I have derived from the use of

Ayer's Sarsaparilla.

Six months ago I was completely covered with a terrible humor and scrofulous sores. The humor caused an incessant and intolerable itching, and the skin cracked so as to cause the blood to flow in many places whenever I moved. My sufferings were great, and my life a burden. I commenced the use of the SARSAPARILLA in April last, and have used it regularly since that time. My condition began to improve at once. The sores have all healed, and I feel perfectly well in every respect—being now able to do a good day's work, although 73 years of age. Many inquire what has wrought such a cure in my case, and I tell them, as I have here tried to tell you, AYER'S SARSAPARILLA. Glover, Vt., Oct. 21, 1882. Yours gratefully,

HIRAM PHILLIPS."

SEASON OF 1884.

This story was related by an officer of the Essex to a friend of mine, who at once came and told it to me. I will add, for the benefit of any ardent Spiritualists or newspaper correspondents, who may desire to go at once to the Marshall Islands in search of new revelations from savage mediums, or to interview the King, that these islands are in the North Pacific Ocean, to the Southwest of the Sandwich Isles, and that there is very little communication with them.—[Fall Mal Gazette.

The Brahman's Terrible Mistake

Some shocking tragedies have occured in the Sibsagcr district of India. A travelling honarie jeweller arrived late one evening at the house of a Brahman with whom he had a slight acquaintance, and displayed his wares. The Brahman, after making some purchase, offered to put him up for the night. The offer was gladly accepted, and it was arranged that the jeweller should sleep on the floor in the room occupied by the Brahman's son, the Brahman and his wife occupying the other room. While preparing to turn in the honarie heard the sharpening of a dao, and fragments of conversation between the Brahman and his wife.

Suspecting foul play, he induced the son to change places with him; and as soon as the former was asleep, placed a dummy composed of a bundle of clothes on the bed, crept quietly out, and ascended a tree at the back of the house. In about half an hour he heard the dao doing its work, then exclamations of dissappointment at finding no plunder, shortly afterward followed by a cry of anguish at the discovery of the mistake the murderer had made. From his place of concealment the jeweller then saw the Brahman come under the tree with a hoe. Here he dug a grave, in which he buried the body of his son. At early dawn the jeweller descended from his hiding place and gave information at the nearest thanna. The police found the body under the tree and arrested the Brahman, whose trial comes off at the next assizes.

A Knowing Dog.

A lady in Newport, who honors me with her friendship, owns a remarkable dog. He is a King Charles spaniel, I believe. The dog is certainly a beauty, with his silky coat, his long ears, and his sympathetic eyes. I don't know his name; it is "Too-too," "Tutu," or "Toto," and they all sound alike, and I never have seen the dear dog's name spelled out. When this famous dog is on exhibition in the beautiful home of my friend, he does wonderful things. His mistress giving him a bit of cracker, says: "Tutu, there is sugar in this, and sugar costs a good deal of money." The dog takes a little bite, and in his mouth hands—if a dog can "hand" a thing in his mouth—the rest of the cracker back. If he is told that the cracker is cheap, that it did not cost anything, he eats it greedily. Sometimes he is told: "Tutu, there is poison in that cracker; don't eat it." Then he paws it to pieces and puts it away from him. In everything he shows intellect and intelligence. Darwin, if you remember, exhibits a very pretty line between intellect and intelligence.—[Philadelphia Press.

JUGGLERS IN INDIA.

The East has long been famous for the expertn ss of its prestidigitateurs. Between the old Ganges and the Orontes, where the bodies of the people are lithe and their limbs pliant, the arts of tumbling, balancing, and moving the person rapidly and regularly, have been handed down in families for hundreds of years. Fanatical penances and religious orgies, in a country where the body is capable of the most unnatural contortions, first give rise to these tricks of legerdemain. They were supposed to assist in atoning for past sins or predicting future privileges. The arts of breathing fire, of protecting the human skin from the heat of molten metals, of safely handling red hot iron, of resisting scalding from immersion in boiling water, of charming and taming reptiles, and of immunity from the poison of their bite, together with kindred feats of magic, so called, may also have been witnessed any day as well, these last thousand years, in many parts of Hindostan. The cunning priest and needy conjuror still hold their power and increase their thrift in spite of growing intelligence.

Knowledge in India contributes to imposture. It governs the native population in the main without guiding it. In ten thousand towns and villages scattered throughout that populous empire, it is the power of the marvelous that holds every caste in subjection. The sagacity of the European residents unmasks the imposition in vain. The masses persevere in their belief that jugglers are possessed of supernatural power, and though they do not bestow upon them the attributes of gods, they pander to their wants as being possessed with demons.

I witnessed many years ago one of the two great impositions of that day in India. Neither, so far as I know, was ever detected. The one I saw was most satisfactorily explained both in theory and by practice. The other, of which I knew through friends, always remained a mystery. The former was "a man who sat in the air;" the latter "a man who was buried alive." One appeared in 1833 in Madras; the other in 1838 in the Punjaub.

The first announcement of Apoosawmy Ragavah was made in the Madras "Male Asylum Herald." It was stated that this Brahmin of high caste had undertaken, for a stipulated consideration, to appear before the English Governor and Council, and as many friends and spectators as chose to assemble, seated cross-legged in the air for the space of half an hour.

At first people were inclined to believe the whole thing a hoax, but the contrary soon appeared. A card, signed by respectable names, shortly came out in the official Gazette, inviting all gentlemen, civil, military and medical, together with their families to assemble at a given hour on a certain day, to see a man sit in the air. The spot proposed for the exhibition was a spacious public square. Everything that would be likely to favor collusion or fraud had been with apparent fairness on the part of the Brahmin scrupulously avoided. The time was noon-day, the place public, the accessories, a pole fixed in the ground and an umbrella to shelter him from the sun's rays; nothing more. There were, indeed, conditions stipulated—such as time for preparation,

For the first few moments after the cloth was removed, the whole mass of spectators seemed too awe-stricken and astonished even to permit themselves to breathe. As they became convinced, however, that their eyes were looking upon a reality—that there was really no delusion—the whole air was rent with acclamations. To the Europeans, too, the exhibition was full of mystery. They agreed that it was the most complete imposition—for such no one doubted it to be—they had ever seen practised, even in India. The most scientific were at a loss for so much as even a surmise as to the cause of the phenomenon. It did not appear possible that it could be any machinery, for the most powerful glasses failed to detect even a wire connecting the seat of the Brahmin with the pole. It could not be nervous energy, were such a theory supposable, for the man who sat there upon nothing was one of the feeblest specimens of humanity. And at that early day Spiritualism, which accounts for all trickeries and cheats by the agency of invisible power, was unknown.

The Brahmin remained moveless, never once shifting his position nor removing his hand from the top of the pole, for exactly thirty minutes. He then offered, through the Pilewahns, to remain suspended as much longer, provided he were paid a certain sum named. But the English were too anxious to possess themselves of the pole used by him to admit of their brooking further delay; besides which, from appearances, the man could sit there from morning till night without suffering the slightest inconvenience. Accordingly, it was intimated to the Brahmin that he had earned his promised reward, and might retire. Disengaging his hand from the pole, he then made a low salaam to the Governor, when his two attendants approached, and with the precision of experts threw the sheet over his head, disappeared behind its folds, and emerged in a moment with both the Brahmin and his pole.

What seemed rather unfair, since the man had apparently performed what he undertook, government peons now laid hold of him and his two attendants, and dragged them into the audience hall. Here the pole was examined by several scientific men and machinists. It was struck, sounded, and searched for secret springs. Some bevelled edge or bulge or projection was carefully looked for. It was in vain. The pole was as smooth and solid as iron could be made. The Pilewahns carried neither bag nor box, and readily divested themselves of enough of their clothing to convince the incredulous that no machinery was concealed about their persons. Within the canvas sheet there was nothing found. To be sure, the Brahmin was subjected to no examination. As every one who has lived in India knows, this would have been an unpardonable outrage upon the laws of caste. He had been assured, besides, that after his performance he should be subjected to nothing that could be construed into an insult to his creed; and as the touch of other than a Brahmin is pollution to a Brahmin, to have searched his clothing would have been a breach of good faith. But it was evident enough that, under the scant garment he wore, no machinery thing ordinarily necessary to support vitality was to be put away. He was virtually, in fact, to be hermitically sealed up, and to continue so under conditions that would appear to make collusion impossible, until the time arrived when means were to be used for restoring him to animation.

I have said that I did not myself witness any of the various experiments that were made to test the sincerity of this faqueer's professions. But I had friends who did, and who were not only eye-witnesses of his exploits, but participators in the work of laying him out like a corpse, placing his body in a coffin, burying him under ground, keeping watch over the spot, in several cases for a whole night at once for a space of three days' time, and resurrecting and restoring him. These persons were men of good judgement, long resident in the East, and little likely to be imposed upon by any gross charlatary. Their veracity was, of course, beyond all doubt; and they declared, one and all, that, by a certain process, known only to himself, the man caused all the functions of life apparently to cease. He stopped breathing; his eyes closed, and his eye balls, when the lids were pulled up, had the dull appearance of a dead man's; his heart ceased to beat; his extremities, and gradually his whole body, became cold; his jaws fell apart; and in every sign life was shown to have departed. Pins were stuck into his epidermis, but there was no sensation of pain. The soles of his feet were tickled, his flesh was touched with red-hot iron, heavy shocks of electricity from the Leyden jar were given him, acids and alkalies were applied to his palate—it was all to no purpose. To all the uses of life, and to all its ills, too, the man was dead.

Their testimony was equally positive as to the inhumation. They themselves, in full possession of their sober senses, and with a determination to expose what they believed to be an imposture, saw the faqueer coffined, sealed in with the Governor's signet, buried five feet under ground, and each in turn watched the spot, in two instances for a whole night, in another, as has been said already, for several days, until the disinterment. His friends then took possession of the body, and the Englishmen were not allowed to witness the process of revivification. But within a few hours, the very same man, unmistakably the faqueer, Sudder Dewanee, who had died, been buried, lain for days in the grave, and resurrected, stood a living person, and apparently none the worse for his experiment, before them

But there is better testimony still to this idiosyncrasy of Sudder Dewanee. An English officer dispatched to the court of Runjeet Sing relates the following in his published journal:

"The monotony, he writes, "of our camp life, was broken this morning by the arrival of a very celebrated character in the Punjaub. He is a faqueer, by name Sudder Dewanee, and is held in extraordinary respect by the Sikhs, from his alleged capacity to bury himself alive for any period of time. Captain Wade told me that he was present at his exhumation, after an interment of some months. General Ventura having buried him in the presence of the maharajah and shelter him from the sun's rays; nothing more. There were, indeed, conditions stipulated—such as time for preparation, concealment of the ascent, immunity from interference, and order among the crowd, none of which, however, were considered unreasonable. It was to be a fair trial of the claims of the priesthood of Brahma to the supernatural.

The chief justice of Sudder Dewanee Adawlet wrote to his associate at Chinleput to be sure to be present at the trial. All Englishmen from stations within a hundred miles of the Presidency hastened to Madras. Expectation was everywhere on tiptoe. English colonels and captains, colectors of revenue and supervisors, provincial judges and palkee-bearers, arranged to be present. And when the day came the entrance to the English Governor's gardens were thronged with carriages and horsemen. A sumptuous breakfast commenced the entertainment—the band played the national air—the Governor and his attendants, in full uniform, proceeded towards the extensive awning—and orderlies were ready to fan the guests as they seated themselves preparatory to the spectacle.

The Brahmin, with the utmost confidence, walked into the space, and making a low salaam, commenced operations. There were two men only in his retinue. These, however, were Pilewahns—a race of men of steady nerve and herculean strength, whose training from infancy is to athletic feats. They came forward—splendid fellows, whose thews were like iron and whose sinews almost protruded from the flesh—and salaamed also. Then, according to Indian custom, having solicited and obtained the Governor's leave, they planted a pole firmly in the ground. This pole, simply an iron casting, resembled the shaft of a woollen mill, was, when fixed firmly in the corth, free from all swaying, without joints or appendages, and from the surface of the ground to its top it was about ten feet high. Throwing over it a huge tent of canvas, the Brahmin and Pilewahns entered the shelter, musicians meanwhile contenting the spectators who thronged around until the preparations were completed. Ten minutes might have elapsed, when the two assistants crept out, hauled off the covering, gave a jerk that denuded the pole, and revealed to the spectators the phenomenon of a man sitting cross legged in the air.

There was no mistake about it. There was the pole. At right angle from its top sat the Brahmin, his right hand resting upon its summit. Nothing more. The rest of his body was separated from it an elbow length. There was no sign of other connection between the Brahmin and the pole. Indeed, to persons familiar with mechanical laws, as much as to the awe struck multitude, there seemed to be no possibility of deception. A joint, at such an angle, subjected to so great a strain, no matter by what connection, would have been depressed. This was not. The exhibitor sat as level as if on solid ground. There was no swaying. Neither depression nor elevation was apparent. On a perfect plane, cross-legged, unconcerned, without the slightest apparent support, sat the Brahmin, counting the beads of his rosary in one hand, touching the top of the pole with the other, and staring with indifference at the multitude.

would have been a breach of good faith. But it was evident enough that, under the scant garment he wore, no machinery could be concealed sufficient to sustain him at right angles to a shaft of iron for half an hour, in a sitting posture. The money was paid, therefore, and the Juggler went his way, to reap, as he did for many months, a harvest of gain from all parts of India. Various explanations were suggested of the trick, for such it undoubtedly was; and a young Madras mechanic attempted, by means of crossbars and rods, rings and rivets, to repeat the success. But none of the former were satisfactory, while the latter ended by the ambitious experimenter tumbling ridiculously to the ground.

The second imposture to which I referred was known all over India as "THE MAN WHO WAS BURIED ALIVE." It created far more excitement than the first. For several years the papers were full of the "burying faqueer;" private letters told about him; rajahs feted him (whenever he appeared above ground); residents gave entertainments to witness his marvelous feat; purses were made up to repay his loss of time (for he claimed no reward for his suspension of life); and there was not, and had never been within the tradition or memory of man, so indisputable a wonder in all the Orient.

Everybody knows that certain animals possess the power of suspending animation at will. The squirrel has it. The hare and rabbit and fox and woodchuck use it as a defense. Everybody knows, too, that in the polar regions there are animals who remain torpid for many months, neither eating nor breathing. Darwin discovered in the tropics thousands of three or four species of animals that astivated—that is, became inanimated—and remained so during the burning heat of summer. In the insect world, temporary death is as familiar to entomologists as temporary life. To say nothing of the batrachia and mollusks, warm-blooded animals—animals whose organs of life resemble those of man—do undoubtedly possess the power or submit to the necessity of a suspension of every function of life. The heart does not beat, nor the blood circulate, nor the senses act, nor the breath come and go. The creature, to all the definitions that life demands, is dead, and yet, at will or upon necessity, life returns. Why, then, should it be thought impossible that the same power or susceptibility, call it which we may, should adhere in man? At all events, men have lived who profess ek the same subjectivity or power; and no careful observation or thorough analysis has succeeded in detecting fraud.

To return to our narrative. Sudder Dewanee, a Mahomedan dervish, aroused the attention of the punjaub in 1838, by professing to be able to suspend the functions of life for any length of time. He proposed, in fact, to be buried alive under ground, and to return to life at a given time. The price, of course, was named, but nothing more. For this sum of money, more or less (its amount to be measured by the length of time inanimation was to continue), Sudder contracted to be interred like a dead man, and to remain inhumed days, weeks, or months, as the bargain might be. There was to be no nourishment of any kind given him during the suspension of life. Air was not to reach him. Everymonths. General Ventura having buried him in the presence of the maharajah and many of his principal sirdars; and, as far as I can recollect, those were the particulars as witnessed by General Ventura: After going through a regular course of preparation, which occupied him some days, the faqueer reported himself ready for interment in a vault which had been prepared for the purpose by order of the maharajah. On the appearance of Runjeet and his court, he proceeded to the final preparations that were necessary in their presence; and after stopping his ears with wax, and every other orifice through which it was possible for air to enter his body (except his mouth), he was stripped naked and put into a linen bag. The last preparation consisted in closing his gullet by turning back his tongue. Falling instantly into a lethargy, the bag was closed and sealed, and the whole placed in a deal-box, which was closed and sealed. The box was then put within the vault, earth thrown in and trodden down, a crop of barley sown over the spot, and sentries stationed around it. The maharajah was very skeptical on the matter, however, and twice in the course of the ten months that the faqueer remained under ground, he sent people to dig him up, when everything was found undisturbed.

"At the expiration of the ten months, Captain Wade witnessed, with scores of the courtiers and the maharajah, the disinterment. He saw the seals broken and the box opened. The man was taken out; and upon feeling his heart, not the slightest pulsation was perceptible. The first thing towards restoring him to life was the forcing of his tongue back to its place. Warm water was then poured over his body for several hours, when he gradually came to life, and the next day was as well as ever."

I have given the account of the man who sat in the air, as I saw the thing done. I have given, also, the account of the man who was buried alive, as I heard and read it. No philosophical explanation of either is needed. They were both impostures, ranking in the same category with the witchcraft of the seventeenth century.

A Capital Scheme.

"What do you do when people come in and bore?" a warm personal friend asked of a merchant.

"When they stay too long the office boy, who is very bright and knows just when to interfere, tells me that a gentleman is in the counting room waiting to see me on important business."

"Ha! Ha! That's a capital way to get rid of bores who don't know——"

Just then the boy opened the door and sang out:

"Gent in the counting room wating to see you on important business."

To find out your husband's, your wife's, or friend's special aversions, and to keep the discovery to yourself while you studiously keep them out of sight and hearing either by deed or word, is true courtesy and true friendship.

SCIENTIFIC GOSSIP.

Among the latest acts of the Hygienic Congress was a denunciation of the modern system of education and competitive examinations as eminently prejudicial to the habit of those subjected to it.

A mixture of 70 parts of air and 40 parts of hydrogen gas ignites at a temperature between 1,026° to 1,028° Fahrenheit, while the ignition point of a mixture of coal gas and air in similar proportions varies from 1,202° to 1,215°.

A uranium mineral is found in the feldspar quarries near the seaport of Moss, on the Christiania Fjord, Norway. It contains nearly 82 per-cent. of uranoso-uranic oxide, with 0.38 of the cerium earths and 2.42 of the yttrium earths.

Scientific works by Agassiz, Buchner, Huxley, Lubbock, Lewes, Moleschott, Reclus, Adam Smith, Spencer, Vogt, Zimmermann, have been added to the list of those already prohibited by ukase from circulation by libraries in Russia.

Two ounces of soda dissolved in a quart of hot water will make a ready and useful solution for cleaning old painted work perparatory to repainting. This mixture, in the above proportions, should be applied when warm, and the woodwork afterward washed with water to remove all traces of the soda.

It is announced in the Nature that a grotto from 8 to 10 metres high has been discovered in a rock washed by the sea, in the Morbihan, by M. Gaillard. He has since continued his researches at low water, and found some human bones, ancient earthenware marked with allegorical figures, and coins believed to have been struck by the ancient Gauls.

Recently the dome of St. Peter's, in Rome, was reclad at an expense to the Vatican of $40,000. The old sheating required such continuous repairs that it was deemed better to replace it. The sheets of lead which now cover the dome welgh 708,610 pounds, and would extend over more than an acre and a half of land if they were spread out flat.

"Suppose," said an examiner to a student in engineering, "you had built an engine yourself, performed every part of the work without assistance, and knew that it was in complete order, but when put on the road the pump would not draw water, what would you do?" "I should look into the tank and ascertain if there was any water to draw," replied the student.

Experiments indicate that the effect of light upon plant tissues without chlorophyll, such as roots, rhizome, blanched plants, and some parasitic plants, is to decrease the intensity of the respiration, more carbonic acid being given off and oxygen absorbed in darkness than in light. The amount of oxygen absorbed is, however, in the same proportion to to the carbonic acid given off in light as in darkness.

Elastic rubber tubing, perfectly gas-tight and free from smell, has lately been invented. It is made of two lays of rubber, with pure soft tin-foil between them, and it retains the flexibility and elasticity of a simple rubber tube. It ought to be serviceable as a connection between a heating and illuminating gas supply pipe and a gas-burning apparatus which re-

DOMESTIC RECIPES.

SPICE ROLL.—"My children are very fond of spice roll. They are always teasing me to make it on baking-day." "How do you make them?" asked my hostess. "I always like to learn all the ways of cooking possible." "I take a loaf of bread when light, and work in some butter and sugar; when it is light again, roll out about half an inch thick, and sprinkle with flour, spice and sugar; commence at one side, and roll up into a loaf; let it get light again and bake." "That is very much the same way in which I make cinnamon roll," said Mrs. B. "I proceed the same as you do until the spreading; then I use butter instead of flour, cinnamon, and sugar. Roll up and cut in slices; lay in a pan; let it get light, and bake. Mine are sliced before baking, and yours after." "I call them buns," says my hostess's sister. So an afternoon's visit resulted, among other things, in the above exchange of methods.

CHICKEN PIE.—For the crust, take equal parts of sour cream and buttermilk, one pint of each; a teaspoonful of salt and one of soda, and make a dough the same as for biscuit. Line the sides of a suitable baking dish (a milk pan is an excellent one) with this paste. It needs no bottom crust, as it is apt to be heavy. Have the chicken already boiled until tender in water seasoned with salt and pepper to the taste. Cut the pieces up well and lay them in the dish, and put in bits of butter here and there. Then cover all with the water in which the chicken has been boiled. It must not be thickened with flour, or in the process of baking it will be too thick. Mold some butter into the remaining crust and cover the pie with it, wetting the edges and pressing them well together. Cut some slits in the centre and bake in a moderate oven an hour or more. When there is no bottom crust used, the remains may be more easily warmed over.

TO COOK SALT PORK.—Soak the slices overnight in sweet milk. Scald them in clear water in the morning and fry. Then dip each slice in a batter made of a couple of eggs, half a teacup of sweet milk, a pinch of salt, and as much flour as can be readily stirred in. Cover each slice thickly with this batter and return to the spider, and cook until the batter is done With workmen, this makes an agreeable variety.

COLD BISCUITS.—Those left over from tea may be made better than when freshly baked, by dipping them into hot water and placing them singly on the grate in the oven long enough before breakfast to let them get well warmed through. In warm weather, when ice is not to be had, fix the butter plate neatly, and place it in a pan of cold water fresh from the well an hour before meal time.

CHICKENS AND MUSHROOMS.—Clean and wash your fowls and stuff them with chopped onions and mushrooms. Fill the craws with the usual dressing. Lay them in a pot and pour soup stock over them. Simmer till tender, then take up on to a hot plate, strain the gravy and season to taste. Stir in a little sifted flour, stir up and boil. Some prefer a little milk mixed with it, and finely chopped parsley boiled in the gravy.

LAMB PUDDING.—There was cold lamb left over after it had been to the table, in Mothers—Their Petty Trials and Some of Results.

I often think how little is understood of the causes that make so many women's lives seem so narrow and petty. People seldom think that we have to set our brains to an evenness with our children's of all ages and temperaments, if the family is large, and to try to keep pleasant and gracious all the time Nothing stimulates so much as to break the monotony, by going out and away, if only for a little excursion to the woods in the bright summer or autumn days, or a brush against the varied minds that city life affords. The mother of a family, large or small, has cares and responsibilities, aches and pains, that are altogether her own, and it is often a wonder to me to see how bright and genial such remain amid many cares. "The back's fitted to the burden" is a homely saying, but a true one, that often occurs to me. As our children grow up and learn more of life, they learn to appreciate better the care and anxiety that have attended their earlier years, and it is a satisfaction to parents to remember that such will be the case. The blessing of a serene mind can never be over-estimated, and a perfect control of one's own spirit will be reflected in the spirit of the household, and form its happiness or misery.

"It is as cross-looking as its mother," I have heard remarked of an ill-tempered child; but no one knows, perhaps, the cause of that mother's humor, or the influence it exerted upon the child even before birth. Men who irritate their wives with every petty trifle, little dream how the effect of such a proceeding may be handed down and reproduced in their children as is the love of tobacco or strong drink. I remember well at the Philadelphia Exposition seeing two infants and their nurse on the grounds, and never did I see the force of expression so fully exemplified. One with a serena face smiled at the passers by, the other held its little face puckered into all sorts of contortions. Yet in dress, and feature, size and complexion they were exactly alike, the difference of the inward spirit making the only variation. Thesigns of old age are more easily seen on a face that bears the stamp of fretfulness, lines form that show the inner working of the mind. Avarice and selfishness are not to be disguised, nor the spirit of unrest that gnaws at many a heart. Yet better for us all, even amid small worries, to be able to govern ourselves, and fight against the narrowing down that is the natural results of our small but unvaried and manifold duties.

The Girls will Marry.

While so many mammas with daughters and carriages are watching the coachmen there are a good many mistresses of households who are watching the maids, says the Philadelphia Times. Few family necessities are so rare as good nurses and chambermaids. When they are good ones they are prized, and their mistresses are afraid of losing them. This is more than ever the case during the summer with nursemaids who are taken away to summer resorts with the children. Nurses are as much affected by moonlight nights on the beach, romantic country surroundings, and the persistent attention of ard-ty of a simple rubber tube. It ought to be serviceable as a connection between a heating and illuminating gas supply pipe and a gas-burning apparatus which requires to be movable, if this sort of rubber and tin tubing can be manufactured of sufficient length

In the course of his Cantor lectures on alloys used for coinage Mr. Chandler Roberts, chemist of the British Mint, said that a short cylinder was the geometrical form which next to the sphere, presented the smallest surface for the greatest weigh', and, consequently, in order to reduce the wear of coins to a minimum, their thickness should be equal to their diameter. Such a form would present many inconviences; but, on the other hand, coins should not be made too thin, and much may be gained by even a small approach to theoretical requirements.

Casting of bronze statues of Buddha is carried on in Bangkok. The process, says a late official report, is of the kind known as "en cire perdue," and the alloy used consists of copper and lead, sometimes with the admixture of a small quantity of zinc. A clay model is first made; upon this a coat of wax is molded, and over this again is put another layer of clay. The whole is then baked, the wax running off through apertures left for that purpose, and the centre core being kept in its place by iron pegs, the alloy is then run into the space previously occupied by the wax.

To prevent the growth of moss or weeds on gravel walks it is recommended to sprinkle salt pretty freely on the paths, (about a pound to the square yard does for one year at least,) care being taken not to let the salt fall on the box borders or the edge of the grass. A damp but not a rainy day is the best for this operation. Some apply a boiling solution of salt (about a pound to a gallon of water) with a common watering pan, so that e pound of salt will be received every square yard of walk. A much weaker solution will serve the same purpose if it should be required again.

For Stutterers.

A gentleman who stammered from childhood almost up to manhood gives a very simple remedy for the misfortune: "Go into a room where you will be quiet and alone, get some book that will interest but not excite you, and sit down and read two hours aloud to yourself, keeping your teeth together. Do the same thing every two or three days, or once a week if very tiresome, always taking care to read slowly and distinctly, moving the lips, but not the teeth. Then, when conversing with others, try to speak as slowly and distinctly as possible, and make up your mind that you will not stammer. Well, I tried this remedy, not having much faith in it, I must confess, but willing to do almost anything to cure myself of such an annoying difficulty. I read for two hours aloud with my teeth together The first result was to make my tongue and jaws ache, that is, while I was reading, and the next to make me feel as if something had loosened my talking apparatus, for I could speak with less difficulty immediately. The change was so great that every one who knew me remarked it. I repeated the remedy every five or six days for a month, and then at with it, and finely chopped parsley boiled in the gravy.

Lamb Pudding.—There was cold lamb left over after it had been to the table in the form of a hot and then a cold joint, so we cut the meat off, cracked the bones and put over the fire in three quarts of water, with an onion, then boiled all down to a quart, and took out the bones; stiffened with bread crumbs, put in seasoning to taste, beat in it two eggs and a bit of butter, and poured into a buttered mould; set into a pan of hot water and cooked for an hour in the oven. Turn out and pour gravy over it.

Water Cookies.—The following recipe for cookies I found in an old paper; Every one liked them and wanted them again: Two eggs, one and one-half cup of sugar, one cup of butter, one-half cup of cold water, one-half teaspoonful of soda, one of cream-of-tartar, though I use tartaric acid, which only takes half as much.

Canning Tomatoes.—Many people complain of their tomatoes spoiling. The reason is that they do not cook them enough. We are always successful. After they begin to boil, season and let cook 20 minutes; can immediately in ordinary fruit jars.

Cauliflower.—It is best tied up in a piece of netting. It should be put into salted water when boiling, and when done be put into a deep dish with the blossoms upward, and a cupful of drawn butter poured over it.

To Cook Parsnips.—Boil till tender in hot, salted water; scrape; slice lengthwise when they are nearly cold. Flour all over and fry in salted lard or dripping.

Miss Astor's Wedding Dress.

Miss Astor's wedding will take place in New York about the middle of November. Her wedding dress is now being made in Paris and will be sent over about the 1st of November. It is to be of very heavy pearl-white satin, made with a full princesse train, which will be bordered by a pelisse of the satin and on the edge a ruching of fine point lace in a wild rose design. The front is to be covered with ruffles of rare point lace that belonged to Miss Astor's grandmother. The lace will not be cut but will cross over in flounces and at the sides will be caught down in a twist and held by a cluster of orange blossoms and pearls. The corsage will be cut square and bordered with the lace, while the sleeves, slightly puffed on the shoulders and reaching to the elbow, will be met by long white kid gloves, which are being made to order to fit the slender little hand of the bride. The slippers are to be of the dress materials and embroidered in white pearls, while the stockings will be of the finest white silk. The veil will probably be of illusion. There is a rare old point lace veil in the family, and this may be worn, although tulle is more becoming and preferred by the bride.

In one of the Philippine Islands it is customary, when a young fellow asks the old folk for their daughter, to send her into the woods at sunrise; and, if the lover finds her before sunset, she is his. If not, he forfeits all claim. The girl is given a start of one hour. This allows her a fair chance, and she can use her own judgment about hiding after she gets into the woods.

mer resorts with the children. Nurses are as much affected by moonlight nights on the beach, romantic country surroundings, and the persistent attention of ardent swains as the rest of their sex, and, as a natural consequence, a good many of them, about the time summer is over, "give warning" and go off and get married.

Only those who have been brought face to face with the difficulty know what a trial it is to lose in this manner a clean, tidy, obedient nurse, who is intelligent and faithful, and who not only takes a great interest in the children but is liked by them in return. But these, of course, are most likely to be the first ones to go off. For some unaccountable cause the summer season just closed has been a remarkable one in the number of maids at service in prominent Philadelphia families who have married or made their arrangements to marry before the winter. There are few families that went off anywhere with maids at all attractive but have had their maids matrimonially assailed or completely captured. In many cases the sources of danger were the waiters at the fashionable hotels where the families were staying. Some of these waiters are very gentlemanly and agreeable, as well as good-looking fellows, and they managed to wreak havoc in many of the handmaidens' hearts. There were some very amusing cases where families ran away from the places they were at to prevent their maids falling in love with the waiters. At the Berkeley Arms, the most fashionable place on the coast, where Cupid ran amuck in the kitchen and ante-chamber, several families took their deprrture from this cause.

In one case the girl is now on trial as daughters are sometimes tested. The family suddenly concluded to go to Europe, and took their nurse with them in the hope of breaking her infatuation for the waiter, a handsome Frenchman. When, as in this case, the nurse is French also, the mistresses have a hard time of it.

The Truly Honorable.—The truly honorable man takes pains to remain ignorant of things that concern him not. He turns aside from the confidental gossip, glances away from the open desk, shuns the place where a whisper is audible, with just as much care as he would use to avoid profiting by a mistake in his change. His curiosity does not crave the knowledge of such matters. It has the whole wide world for its area, and seeks its satisfaction in more wholesome directions. After all, the information to which we have no right is the smallest and poorest and least valuable to us of any that we can obtain. Let us cultivate a worthy curiosity on subjects that shall enlarge our minds, deepen our feelings, and strengthen our purposes, and we shall shrink from that ignoble inquisitiveness that revels in dishonest gains.

Nothing is easier than fault-finding. No talent, no self-denial, no brains, no character is set up in the grumbling business. But those who are moved by a genuine desire to do good and benefit their fellows have little time for mumering or complaint.

The Napanee Express.

NAPANEE, FRIDAY, OCT. 31, 1884.

—A special despatch to the Globe announces that Sir John Macdonald has been examined by Sir Andrew Clark, and he pronounces him free from any serious ailment.

—It is in this language that the Standard cruelly gibes its numerous friends who were struck off the voters' lists: "Now they go around town with shame faced expression explaining, 'We can't vote much, but our influence is great.'"

—The Peterboro' Review says that "it knows of no Conservative promise that protection could prevent commercial depression." It would take a very large scrap-book to hold what the editor of the Review does not know about political matters.

—The Standard last week returned to its attack on the County Registrar, and in the course of its wearisome string of words admitted that Mr. Mills had a perfect right to "refuse to come to the court and produce the documents without the Judge's order and the lawful fee." That is quite true. Then why all this talk about the matter? Mr. Mills merely exacted his lawful fee because of the abuse given by the party who subpœnaed him. He did no more than was right, and no more than anybody else would do under the same circumstances. The Tory organ had better hunt up some other grievance; this one will not pass muster.

—What has become of Sir John's little story about the two barley farms? A few years ago it was a sweet morsel on the lips of every Tory spouter. Now they seem to have forgotten it. The reason is that it will not suit the occasion. On the 17th Sept., we have to convey, may be put in these words, 'Sell and pay up.' Don't sell if you do not require to, and if you do not want to; but pay up your accounts any way, or rather your debts. This notion of leaving accounts unpaid is ridiculous and old-fashioned. It should be obsolete. Non-payment of these debts at the time when they ought to be paid, and at the time, too, when everybody expects them to be paid, has a depressing and deadening effect on general business, and increases considerably the costs and worries of trade. It is the bounden duty of every man who owes two dollars, or ten dollars; or one hundred dollars to the merchants of Lindsay, or Woodville, or Beaverton, or Cresswell, or wherever you please, to go and pay it now, and not put it off till winter or spring. Farmers should realize upon their surplus, and pay their store and other debts. If they think it wiser not to sell now of course they must act on their own discretion; but debts should not go unpaid. It is as bad for the farmer as it is for the business man. It will pay the farmer better to settle his accounts now, or on short dates, and not to let them run too long. It is not necessary to enlarge upon this point. Every farmer can see it. Let every farmer interested act upon it.'"

—The great contest for the Presidency of the United States will be fought out at the polls on Tuesday next. Both the Republican and Democratic parties are confident of victory. During the past week, both candidates have been given great ovations in the two great cities of the Republic—Cleveland in New York, and Blaine in Chicago. The processionists in New York were mainly liberal Republicans, who are supporting Cleveland. New York state is now considered pretty safe for Cleveland, and if he carries Indiana and New Jersey, which usually go democratic but are now considered doubtful, he will be the next President. Mr. Hendricks, the Democratic nominee for the Vice-Presidency, has declared himself straight for revenue tariff, and Cleveland is equally as pronounced a low tariff man. With these men at the head of affairs, free trade would soon be established between Canada and the United States, and both countries would be benefitted thereby. It is on this account that so much interest is taken in Canada in the present contest, and that our public journals desire to see the Democrats triumphant.

—The hundredth birthday of Sir Moses Monteifore, the great Jewish philanthropist, was celebrated all over the world on Sunday last. Service was held in all the Jewish synagogues, and Sir Moses, who is in excellent health, was the recipient of eight hundred letters and six hundred telegrams of congratulation, besides numerous addresses and boquets. He attended the special sermon in London and insisted on standing through the entire service. At the conclusion he said, in a very strong voice: "I cannot tell a thousandth or ten thous-

WHO IS BLAINE?

A Knowing Farmer Tells what he Knows about the Presidential Prospects of next Tuesday.

They were seated around the dinner-table of a leading Dundas-st. restaurant last Saturday and the conversation turned upon the pending contest for the presidency of the neighboring republic. Various walks of life were represented among those taking part in the discussion—from the professor to the intricacies of the manipulation of the moveable alphabet, down to the groceryman, whose occupation has been made famous by the humerous pen of Mr. Peck. Seated about midway down the table was a venerable agriculturist.

"Yes," said the last-mentioned gentleman, "I have studied American politics since I was a boy; and I know all the ins and outs of the whole business."

"Well," queried a dry goods clerk, as he for the third time pushed his brass cuff button through the worn-out button hole, "what do you think of St. John's chances?"

"St. John's? Well, he might be elected, but I hope he won't. That one act of his alone of letting that Secretary of the Treasury of his escape to Canada with so money—what was this his name was?"

"Eno," suggested one of his hearers.

"Eno, yes, that's it. That thing alone should defeat him. He had no right to let him off with so much money. These Republicans should be turned out anyway—they're too extravagant.

"How about Cleveland?" asked a noted ex-counselman who sat opposite.

"Cleveland—Cleveland? Oh, yes; that's the fellow that started this here town in Ohio. I was coming down Lake Erie, from Detroit to Buffalo some years agone, and we called in there. The harbor is a sort of bay, running for all the world like a pair of shafts, and we run right down in between them shafts, as it were, and stopped up against an old played-out pier that stuck out like an old whiffletree does when it gets turned around. It looked like a seedy, one-horse place from where we were, and a cloud of smoke hung over the town like a cover. But for all that he might be elected if it wasn't that the old greenback cry had about died out. Then them Democrats have gone to work and nominated a Dr. May Lockwood, or some such name. I think they must have been crazy. Now, if they had nominated Geo. William Curtis they might have elected him, but pshaw!"

"Well," asked one, "Who do you think will get it?"

"I don't know exactly, but I rather think that that widow—what's this her name is? Oh, yes, Mrs. Butler. She might get it. She's the temperance candidate you know, and the temperance cause has strengthened wonderfully in the past few years back. I know down in North Fredericksburgh where I live, my neighbors are all crazy to get a chance to vote for the Scott Act, although I don't know what the dickens they're going to do with their barley."

"What's your opinion of Blaine's chances?" asked the cranium skating-rink man, who holds down the foot of the table every noon.

"Blaine—Blaine? Who's he?" asked the agriculturist. But the five-minutes-to-one bell peeled forth in mournful music just then and the old fellow's question is still unanswered.

When You Feel Blue

and your back aches, and your head feels heavy, and you wake unrefreshed in the morning, and your bowels are sluggish and costive, you need Kidney-Wort. It is nature's great remedy, and never fails to relieve all cases of Diseased Kidneys, Torpid Liver, Constipation, Malaria, Piles, Rheumatism, &c. It operates simultaneously on the Kidneys, Liver and Bowels, strengthening them and restoring healthy action. Put up in of every Tory speaker. Now they seem to have forgotten it. The reason is that it will not suit the occasion. On the 17th Sept., 1878, the day Sir Richard Cartwright was defeated in Lennox, because he would not give "protection" to the farmers, barley sold on the Napanee market for from $1 to $1.10 per bushel. Yesterday, under a protective system, the same quality of barley sold on the Napanee market for 55c. The farmers should, after making this comparison, experience no difficulty in seeing that it was by grossly fradulent statements that they were induced to reject the ex-Finance Minister.

On Tuesday last, the bill of particulars against Mr. D.W. Allison, M.P., was served on his solicitors, Messrs. Deroche & Madden, and the same day the particulars in the cross-petition against Mr. M. W. Pruyn were also served. The charges against Mr. Allison number over two hundred, while those against Mr. Pruyn count up about one hundred and seventy-six. A request has come to us from disinterested parties asking that the charges be published in THE EXPRESS for the information of our readers. This we cannot comply with without committing contempt of court. No doubt many of the charges on both sides are wholly groundless, and it would be a great injustice to the accused to herald to the world a charge of committing bribery or having accepted a bribe when they were innocent. A charge of this kind generally travels farther than a contradiction and invariably when a false charge is made the accused suffers more or less injury. Of course the lawyers on both sides are granted full liberty by the law to make charges if they believe there is foundation for them, but that does not warrant a publisher in circulating them broadcast over the country merely to gratify the curiosity of their readers. If that were allowed, a publisher might as well print the pleadings in any suit in the higher courts. When the case is tried it will be reported fully in THE EXPRESS, and then the charges and contradiction, if any, will appear at the same time.

The short paragraph in last issue on the propriety of farmers selling sufficient of their grain to pay their store accounts, so as to enable merchants to meet their payments and thus avert financial disaster, has met with cordial approval from many of our leading business men. They say that the tendency with many farmers is to hold their grain for as long a period as a year, and make the merchants wait for that length of time for payment of accounts which should be paid promptly every fall. The result is that merchants become embarrassed, business unsettled, and bankruptcy frequently follows. This evil is not confined to Napanee alone, but affects the whole province. The merchants in the smaller villages are also sufferers by this evil. The Lindsay Post has the following appropriate remarks on the same subject: "Now, the message through the entire service. At the conclusion he said, in a very strong voice: "I cannot tell a thousandth or ten thousandth part of what I feel when, by the blessing of the Almighty, I have arrived at so full an age. I thank Him for His merciful providence, and I thank all my friends for their great kindness." Sir Moses has done more from his vast wealth to relieve distress among the Jews than any man living, and his benefactions to Christians have also been on a liberal scale. It was as a philanthropist that he won a baronetcy from Queen Victoria in 1846.

THE SCOTT ACT.

Defeated in Prince Edward, but Carried in Bruce, Dufferin, Huron and York, N. B.

[Special to THE EXPRESS.]

TORONTO, Oct. 31.—Complete returns not yet received; so far as heard, there is a majority for the Act in Bruce of 713, Dufferin, 884; Huron, 1,568, and York, N.B., 300. The Act was defeated in Prince Edward County, by about 125 majority.

A Wise Precaution.

[Peterboro Examiner.]

As a political precaution it is wise to look well after the voters' lists, to see that no proper names are omitted and no improper names inserted. The Reformers of Lennox look well after this matter and the result justifies their efforts. At the recent Appeal Court held in Napanee, thirty-two Reform votes were added to the list for Parliamentary purposes, and thirty-seven for municipal purposes. Had the Tory assessor, whom the wirepullers succeeded in appointing this year, been allowed to work his own sweet will, a difference of sixty-four in a parliamentary election, if it had occurred on this year's roll, would have been the result. It is as easy, if they are not watched, for the Tories to gerrymander an assessment roll as a province.

Sale of Toll Gates.

Barry, $2,400; No. 2, Mr. L. Babcock, $800. Yesterday the lease of a toll gate on the Kingston and Sydenham road was sold to Mrs. Dougherty for $400.

ERNESTTOWN'S CENTENARIAN.

Sketch of the Life of Mrs. Smith—Interesting Reminiscences.

The Kingston Whig gives the following sketch of the life of Mrs. Smith, Ernesttown's centenarian, whose hundredth birthday was celebrated last week, and to which brief reference was inserted in THE EXPRESS :—

Mary Smith is widow of the late D. C. Smith, who died sixteen years ago at a ripe old age. She came from Schoharie county, New York, with her father, Andrew Leeman, about 1812, and settled near Wilton. Being United Empire Loyalists they found the republic a very warm country at that time of international trouble, and Canada was to them a land of refuge. They settled at Collinsby for a while in the early days of their sojourn in the province. Her father and mother were long-lived, living to be ninety and eighty years respectively, and her sister, Mrs. Dewitt, died last year near Wilton at the great age of 96 years. Mrs. Smith had nine children, of whom seven survive, and there is a following of forty grandchildren. Three of her daughters married three brothers, named Hartman, and survive them. They, with Joseph Smith and widow Booth, and our hostess of Monday (Mrs. Benjamin), brothers and sisters, live in that section. Mrs. Horning, of Dresden, Ont., is the only daughter away from the neighborhood of the family's first settlement. The youngest child, Mrs. Benjamin, is fifty-two years old. Thus, for longevity, the family is remarkable. Andrew Leeman came over in company with Elisha Lewis, Matthew Dice, J. Dewitt and their families, and they early became connected by marriage and have lived as a happy circle since. D. C. Smith, husband of the centenarian, was engineer on the main road between Kingston and Napanee, and of many of the side roads. Later in life he was Superintendent of Lighthouses, a post he relinquished to his late son, Darius Smith, so well known and regarded by Kingstonians.

Mrs. Smith is able to move rapidly about the house, and to eat heartily three or four meals a day, her digestion being remarkable, a result of hardy pioneer life in her younger days. Her hearing is not good, but her daughters are able to converse with her ; while her eyesight enables her yet to do a little sewing. She still "keeps house' in her own room, and makes up the bed daily. She does not furnish a startling evidence of the ill effects of tobacco, as she has been for years a votary of its pleasures.

EARLY SCENES AND INCIDENTS.

Mrs. Smith related to her visitors on Monday many incidents attending her arrival in Canada. The refugees came over in sleighs with horses, and were nearly drowned in crossing the ice at Kingston. A foot path traced out by blazed trees was the only route from Kingston to what is now Odessa. The only house on this latter spot was Booth's mill, to which the settlers carried their grain on horseback, not knowing enough (as she laughingly said) to divide the grain into two bags to balance it on the horse's back ; they balanced it with a stone on one side. The next house to be erected in Mill Creek, the first name for Odessa, or within a mile of it, was Paul Somers' tavern and a few years later every house on the road to Kingston became a tavern or "canteen," as then styled. It used to be said that if a man took care to stop at every canteen on the road he might go to Kingston bareheaded and barehanded without suffer-

THE SCOTT ACT.

Some of the Most Important of the Provisions of the Scott Act which is Going into Force.

In these days of temperance activity the words "Scott Act" are on the tongue of almost everyone, but beyond the hazy idea that the passage of the Act in some way or other puts a sudden extinguisher upon the free sale of liquor, the majority of the people know little or nothing of the provisions of the "Canada Temperance Act of 1878," popularly known as tht "Scott Act," after its originator, the Hon. R. W. Scott, who introduced it into Parliament in the year 1878, that it might take the place of the Dunkin Act, which time had shown to be unsatisfactory in some particulars.

PROVISIONS OF THE ACT.

The Act declares that from the day on which a majority of the electors of a town or county shall decide upon its adoption no persons, whether or not they possess a common liquor license, shall, under any circumstances whatever, sell or barter spirituous or intoxicating liquors, or any mixed liquor capable of being used as as a beverage and parts of which are spirituous. The only liquor which may be sold is that for sacramental or medicinal purposes, or for bona fide use in some art, trade and manufacture, and which may only be vended by druggists and other sellers specially licensed by the Provincial Lieutenant Governor. There may be only one of these vendors in each township or parish and two in each town, while in cities one vendor is allowed for every 4000 inhabitants. Liquor for medicinal purposes can be sold only in quantities of a pint or more, and only on the certificate of a medical man, who has no interest in the sale of liquor by the vendor or druggist who fills the prescription. When liquor is needed for use in any art, trade or manufacture, the applicant must procure a certificate signed by two justices of the peace asserting the bona fide nature of the application, and also make an affirmation that the

in the manner set forth in the application. All druggists and vendors must keep an accurate account of all sales and make an annual return to the Collector of Inland Revenue, giving the names of every purchaser and the quantity he obtained. Distillers and brewers, however, may sell liquor of their own manufacture in quantities of ten gallons or more, or in the case of ale or beer of eight gallons or more to druggists, licensed vendors, and persons whom they have good reasons to believe will carry it out of the town or county into some sections of the country where the Scott Act is not in force. Manufactures of pure native wines made from grapes grown by them in the Dominion of Canada, may be licensed by the municipal councils and other authorities having jurisdiction, to sell wines in quantities of not less than ten gallons at one time, except when sold for sacramental or medieinal purposes, when any number of gallons from one to ten may be sold. Merchants engaged in the wholesale trade may sell in the same way that distillers may.

PENALTIES.

The penalties for infringement of the Act are severe. Any person found selling liquor in violation of the law is subject to a fine of not less than $50 for the first offence and not less than $100 for the second, and to imprisonment for not less than three months for the third and every subsequent offence. An assistant is held equally guilty with the principal and receives the same punishment. All the liquor on the premises of such an offender is subject to confiscation.

that if a man took care to stop at every canteen on the road he might go to Kingston bareheaded and barehanded without suffering. Mrs. Smith still bitterly denounces the drunkenness of the old times. Booth's mill was owned by a grandfather of Philip Booth of Odessa. It was a regular custom to go to church on horseback, and many a time Mr. and Mrs. Smith took their young family along, sitting them in front and behind on the animals.

IN A PORTSMOUTH ROMANCE

an uncle of Mrs. Smith figured, early in the days of American independence. He came to Kingston on a visit to friends in the bay that now makes Portsmouth harbor, saw with the Indians two white girls named Rogers. One of them made known her desire to escape. They had been captured in New York State by the savages, their four grandparents being murdered as too old to take along. Families grouped in those days because of the danger of life in detached settlements, and their parents were both working in the bush, and knew nothing of the massacre and capture until they saw the flames of their house and hurried home. The visitor secured the girl's release by an offering of presents, and afterwards married her and lived very happily. Her sister could not be persuaded at first to leave the Indians, but finally joined her sister in her home in N. Y. state.

The American Grain Crop.

The grain crop of America for 1884 is the largest aggregate ever recorded. The statistics given by the Agricultural bureau of Washington, are marvellous. The quantity of wheat is surprising, but the yield of corn is stupendous. The figures given are eighteen hundred millions of bushels. Just imagine the quantity of Johnny cake that means. Why it would cover the entire continent two inches deep with batter. The weight of the grain is five millions of tons, and at twenty thousand pounds to the car, would load five million freight cars—not counting the odd fraction of four hundred thousand tons, or forty thousand cars more! If a solid train was made up, reaching from Portland, Oregon, via the Northern Pacific, Michigan lines, and the Grand Trunk from Portland, Maine; then to Boston, Albany, Chicago, Davenport and San Francisco by the Union and Central; thence to New Orleans by the Southern and Texas Pacific, and via Mobile, Charlestown and Richmond to Washington; thence via Cincinnati, St. Louis, Kansas City, the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe and the Mexican Central to the City of Mexico—a distance of over fourteen thousand miles, doubling four times across the continent and taking in half of Canada and Mexico, such a train would contain only one half of the cars necessary to move this crop of corn.

Prompt Measures.

Prompt measures should be used to break up sudden colds and cure coughs in their early stages. Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam does this most speedily and effectively.

To the Ladies.

McGregor & Parke's Carbolic Cerate will cure any case of Pimples on the face or Rough Skin on either hands or face and leave them soft as silk. It will also heal any sore when all other preparations fail. Thousands have tested it. Ask your druggist for McGregor & Parke's Carbolic Cerate, and do not be persuaded to take anything else claimed to be as good. It is but 25 cents per box, at A. T. Grange's and T. A. Huffman's drug stores, Napanee; also, at James Aylsworth's drug store, Tamworth.

—Costiveness is the cause of the intolerable "bad breath" of multitudes. Dr. Henry Baxter's Mandrake Bitters remove the cause and prevent the evil, and cost only 25 cents.

A Safe Investment.

Investing 25 cents for a bottle of Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam, the best throat and lung healer known. Cures coughs, bronchitis, asthma and all pulmonary complaints.

tender is subject to confiscation.

PRELIMINARY CONDITIONS.

In order to submit the Act to the popular vote it is necessary that a petition signed by at least one-fourth of the electors of the county or city, be presented to the Secretary of State for Canada, praying that the votes of the electors be taken for and against the measure. SIDNEY'S FOLLY

CHAPTER XXI.

For some days after the interview with the detective Sidney Daunt lived in a pitiable state of excitement and restless uncertainty and suspense, which was likely to tell greatly on her health, but which she struggled hard to conceal under an appearance of gaiety, which more than once was on the verge of becoming hysterical.

She was wretchedly unstrung and excited, far fuller of fear than hope regarding the result of Hopgood's inquiries and full of a vague terror as to her own share in instituting them. The poor girl was so utterly alone in her sorrow that it was no wonder her anguish was doubly increased thereby. There was no one to whom she could go for advice or assistance, no one in whom she dared confide. More than once she thought of telling Christine Greville of Frank's nocturnal visits, and her endeavors in his behalf; but she repudiated the notion as imprudent, for the poor girl was in wretched health, drooping daily like an unwatered flower in the anguish and uncertainty respecting her brother's fate, and Sidney feared that she would by her agitation and distress betray that something had been heard and seen of the unfortunate accused. And yet on that rainy October day on which Stephen Daunt had been thrown from his horse and his wife had driven to meet Frank Greville at Lymouth, the latter had asked Sidney so piteously if there was the least hope of his seeing his sister that she had been sorely inclined to risk the danger. That interview with her old friend and former fiance had been far more painful than the first one. Gray as the day was, she was enabled to see by its light much of terrible change in the unfortunate young man which had escaped her in the moonlit summer-house, and it seemed to Sidney that her heart would never cease aching with a dull ceaseless pain which it was impossible to forget even for a moment; and she had vowed to herself then that she would leave no stone unturned until his innocence was proved.

He had not urged this upon her in the second interview as he had done in the first. One or two disjointed sentences had escaped his lips: but he had uttered entreaties that she should endeavor to have the murder sifted, although he had seemed even more downcast and dispirited and despairing. Mingled with the despondency was a strange resignation foreign to his nature, which Sidney could not understand; and she found herself more than once in the act of recalling enigmatical sentences that he had spoken which she did not clearly understand, but which seemed to say that if his innocence were proved it could only beat some terrible cost to her.

She had heard nothing further from the detective; night and morning however, as the post-hours drew near, her heart beat wildly, and she turned sick and faint with anxiety and suspense and dread. Sometimes she feared that her senses would fail, that her brain would give way in her terror and anxiety, that she would fall ill, and in her delirium

The color rose slightly in her face. She believed in Stephen's justice and kindness in all things but in this one—his belief in Frank Greville's guilt.

"Is Christine well enough to leave home?" Dolly asked. "I thought she was very ill."

"She is very ill," Sidney answered impetuously—"dying, I fear; but the change might do her good."

"What is her illness?" Lloyd asked, glancing over at Dolly as she sat opposite to him in her dainty morning dress of pale blue cashmere and velvet.

"A very common one," said Sidney, suddenly looking across at him with unhappy defiant eyes, "although some medical men will tell you that it is a myth—a broken heart."

"If medical men call it a myth, we in in our profession are often forced to acknowledge its existence," the young barrister said, with some feeling in his tone. "Has this young lady seen much trouble then?"

"Yes, very terrible trouble," Sidney answered briefly.

"Some disappointment, I suppose?" he suggested

"Does your professional experience tell you that a girl's trouble must of necessity be connected with love?" Sidney asked with a little bitter laugh.

"No, certainly not," he rejoined, with a slight smile. "But it is a natural association, I suppose. What is this particular trouble?"

"I will tell you," Sidney answered, almost with passion. "She had one brother—one whom she loved as dearly as, ay, ten times more dearly than many women love their lovers—and he was unjustly accused of murder, and sent forth into the world a miserable outcast, hunted and persecuted!"

"Were no efforts made to prove his innocence? How did he escape punishment?"

"By flight," Stephen said, breaking in suddenly, and speaking with unusual bitterness, as he thought how the memory of this man stood between him and his wife and held them asunder so cruelly. "Even before the Coroner's jury had given their verdict he had disappeared; and since then he has successfully eluded pursuit. I think there was no one in Ashford who did not sympathise cordially with his unhappy father and sister; but——"

"They could spare no sympathy for a man unjustly accused and sent out into the world, like Cain, with the brand of a murderer; but, who, unlike Cain, was innocent," Sidney concluded bitterly.

"I think I remember the case," Lloyd Milner said hurriedly, recalling the Ashford murder, and regretting his questions. "It was a very painful one. Well, Miss Dolly," he added abruptly, to change the subject, "is that momentous question of costume decided yet?"

"My costume for mamma's fancy ball on the first?" Dolly said nervously. "Well I am not sure. I am to have some more engravings by this evening's post; and perhaps, if you have nothing better to do this morning, you will help me to look over those I have."

"With much pleasure."

Stephen went away that morning—for the first time since his marriage—without from her face, even her lips were white; and, save for the passionate burning eyes it might have been the face of a dead woman, so colourless and immobile was it.

"And—and," she said breathlessly; but her voice failed her, the words died away on her parched lips, and she could only stand trembling, gazing at him with terrified dilated eyes.

"You would ask me if I understand the purport of your little note?" he said gently. "Is not that it, Mrs. Daunt!"

"Yes," she breathed, rather than uttered.

"How can I answer you?" he said, with some hesitation, pitying her intense anguish, yet angry with her for the deception she was evidently practising towards her husband. "The few words written therewould have been unintelligible to me, Mrs. Daunt, had a clue to their meaning not been supplied by the conversation at breakfast."

"Ah!"

"I cannot help gleaning that the 'Chrissie' spoken of there," he went on, with the same gentleness of manner, "is the lady spoken of this morning; therefore I conclude that the writer of the note is the unfortunate young man her brother."

Sidney's head dropped. She was calmer now, with the calmness of despair. Doubtless all was lost. This man who had discovered her secret would betray her to her husband; it would be found that Frank had been in the neighborhood, and he would be arrested, and she whom he had trusted would be the cause! The thought was almost unbearable agony. She raised her hands to her head with a little despairing gesture, and pushed back her hair from her forehead feverishly. The young man, watching her, thought he had never seen a face so lovely in its misery, so miserable in its loveliness.

"It will not need much cleverness to guess that for some time you have been in communication with Mr. Greville," he said quietly. "For some days past I have unwillingly been forced to conclude that you had some secret which your husband did not share, and I was grieved to think it. Believe me, Mrs. Daunt, the course you are pursuing can bring you only remorse and trouble. To deceive a man so generous and true and trusting as Stephen Daunt is can give you only remorse at best. Why not have told him that you are anxious to do what you can to prove the innocence of Mr. Greville, and ask his help? He can advise and help you and take from your shoulders a burden they cannot bear alone?"

"Why not?" she echoed bitterly. "You remember what passed in this room half an hour ago, and you ask that! You heard how cruelly and bitterly Stephen spoke; you see how convinced he is of Frank's guilt. Even if he loved me—and you, who sees so much, must have seen that he does not—he would not help me in this."

"He would help you—only ask him," Lloyd Milner said earnestly.

"I have asked him. I have entreated him to do so; but he will not. Ah, if you remember the circumstances you will not wonder at it!" she went on, with increased and passionate bitterness. "She was so beautiful—so beautiful, and—senses would fail, that her brain would give way in her terror and anxiety, that she would fall ill, and in her delirium betray the truth to Stephen and those around her. Sometimes she thought that she could bear it no longer, that it would kill her, that she must give way under it and let herself drift to that world where she might find peace. But at such times as these the thought of Frank's loneliness and helplessness animated her courage, and she struggled against her despair and took up her weapons to fight the battle of life—her weapons of smiles and gay chatter, with which she managed successfully enough to deceive Dolly, and partly to deceive Stephen, but not in any way to deceive the keen-eyed lawyer, whose gray eyes, kindly and almost compassionate as they were sometimes, Sidney was beginning to dread and shrink from, as if they had the power of reading her very soul.

But even if this arsenal of hers could not conceal the change in her appearance which could not fail to ensue from such intense, ceaseless, if suppressed, excitement—the violet shadows so deep and dark under the sweet eyes which had such a feverish lustre, such a restless light, the hollows in the pale cheeks, the pathetic droop of the sweet mouth which was so infinitely touching and sorrowful. And Stephen Daunt, noticing all this, felt sad and heavy-hearted for the woman for whom he would have laid down his life, but to whom he was unable to give happiness.

He himself was about again. The wound on his head was completely healed, although it had left a scar on his broad white brow and an occasional headache was its consequence, and his arm was progressing in the most satisfactory manner. Lloyd Milner's visit was drawing to a close ; and while his host was most unwilling to agree to his departure and Dolly's pretty blue eyes grew wistful and sorrowful at the thought of it, Sidney felt a most inhospitable relief, for which she chided herself in vain. If he were gone, and Dolly were to return to Lambswold, she would be more free. She would, during Stephen's long absences every day at the mills, to which he gave daily more of his time and attention, have time to collect her thoughts and leisure for the relief of tears she dared not indulge in now, however much her eyes might ache and her temples throb. And, oh, how glad she would be to escape the scrutiny of those keen gray eyes which haunted her even in her sleep and made her wake up sometimes in an agony of terror, her brow damp with perspiration, her hands burning with fever !

It was no wonder then that she avoided their gaze one morning as she addressed her husband with studied calmness across the breakfast-table, wondering if, as she spoke, the intense nervousness under which she had been laboring would be noticed.

"Stephen," she said, "have you any objection to my inviting Miss Greville to stay with us for a few days?"

"Objection, Sidney?" he returned. "No, indeed! Why should I have?"

"Many of her old friends have shunned her since she has been in trouble," said Sidney unsteadily.

"And did you think I was mean enough to do so?" he replied, with a soupçon of indignation.

"With much pleasure."

Stephen went away that morning—for the first time since his marriage—without his customary farewell to his wife; and Sidney went up to her rooms too much absorbed in her own thoughts to note the omission. Dolly followed her up stairs making some trifling remarks about the ball; and while the girl went to her room to get the pictures as to which she had asked Lloyd's advice, Sidney went to her boudoir, where she she was secure from observation.

Having locked the door, she sat down before her pretty writing-table and put her hand into the pocket of her cashmere morning-gown, to feel for a note which that morning's post had brought her. The next moment she had risen, grasping the table for support and trembling in every limb—the note was not there!

For the space of a minute Sidney stood spell-bound, unable to move in her agony of terror; then, recovering herself by a great effort, she flew, rather than ran, down stairs to the dining-room. Her husband's friend was there alone, standing in deep thought by the table.

"I have lost something," she said, too unnerved to conceal her agitation—"a letter. I must have dropped it. Not a letter—a note."

She was bending down hurriedly, looking under the table, and she did not see the curious look he gave her.

"Is this it, Mrs. Daunt?" he said quietly. "It can hardly be called even a note."

She stood up eagerly glancing at the bit of paper that he held.

"Yes, yes, that is it," she panted, snatching it from him with an eagerness strangely at variance with her usual languid, calm manner. "Thank you, thank you."

She was about to leave the room, when his voice arrested her steps.

"Mrs. Daunt!"

"What is it?" she said, standing in the middle of the room, her hands holding tightly the slip of paper that she had taken from him.

"I think it right to tell you that I have read what is written there," he said gravely. "I did so unintentionally in lifting the paper from the floor, where I suppose you dropped it."

Her hands sank helplessly to her sides, her whole form seemed to shrink and collapse, and a terrible look crossed her ghastly face. Twice her pale lips moved as if she were about to speak; but no words came, and they stood looking at each other in an awful silence which he would not and she could not break.

CHAPTER XXII.

"You have read it?"

The words came slowly and as it were unwillingly from Sidney's pale dry lips ; and, if Lloyd Milner had not seen them move, and had not known there was no one else in the room, he would not have believed that she had spoken, so harsh and changed, so unnatural did the husky strained sound as the words fall upon the stillness.

"Yes, I have read it," he answered, in a low tone, feeling pained and grieved at the humiliation her tone and manner expressed, as she stood trembling in every limb. Every shade of color had faded wonder at it !" she went on, with increased and passionate bitterness. "She was so beautiful—so beautiful, and—and Stephen loved her—not Frank only."

She had striven to speak calmly ; but Lloyd, watching her, saw how she trembled, and how, but for the support of a chair on which she leaned, she must have fallen, At any other time he would have tried to soothe her distress; but her last words had startled him even beyond his own powers of self control, and he could only look at her in amazement, and wonder at the meaning of her words.

"You don't understand," she said, striving to steady her trembling lips—"you don't know all. Frank loved her, and Stephen ; but Mr. Rutledge was wealthy, and she married him, and they were miserable. She," she went on, with sudden fierceness—"she is the one who deserved to suffer; she was the cause of it all, not Frank, whose only fault was loving her."

"As you say, I do not know all," he answered gravely. "I remember reading the case at the time; but it slipped my memory. Stephen was not even a witness I think," he went on meditatively. "If he had had anything to say, probably I should remember it all the better on that account. But am I mistaken in the notion that Mr. Greville, who was supposed, I think, to have eloped with the murdered man's wife, was engaged to some young lady here?"

"No, you are not mistaken," she said desperately. "He was engaged to me."

"To you!" he said, in intense surprise. —"To me.'

Lloyd Milner was silent then. Sorry as he had been for Sidney—ay, and for her husband—a few minutes before, he was doubly sorry now; and although it was impossible that he should guess at all the truth, he could not help filling in for himself the blank parts of the story. Sidney, he thought, had married Stephen when her first engagement came to an end, as so many girls married, for wealth and freedom, and, having these, she could not resist attempting to prove the innocence of the man she really loved, even though she believed him in love with another woman. Young as Lloyd Milner was he had had a large experience of the world, and he knew something of the strangeness of womankind—how often they acted with utter disregard of self, and just in the opposite manner to that in which they might have been expected to act. That Sidney was terribly unhappy he did not doubt for a moment; but, much as he pitied her, he was yet more grieved for Stephen, whom he loved, and who had, as he feared, shipwrecked his life by marriage with a woman whom he did not love and who did not love him. And yet surely he loved her ! thought the young barrister, remembering the few earnest words in which Stephen had asked him to come and see him "made the happiest of men," and the look of earnest passionate love in his eyes as he had stood by Sidney on his wedding day. Six months had not yet elapsed, and they were estranged and cold—and they had all their lives to spend together !

"Mrs Daunt," he said earnestly, "I am an old friend of Stephen's, and, for his sake, I should like to be yours. Believe me when I tell you that nothing but misery can ensue from any such deception as this. It would be better—far better, to entreat Stephen for his assistance—he will not refuse you when he sees how your heart is set upon it—than to keep up this system of deception which must be—indeed I see it is—so distasteful to you."

"Do you think I would have tried it," she cried passionately, "if there had been any other alternative? There is none. He will not help me. He hates Frank, and, if he knew that——" She paused suddenly in terror, afraid that she had betrayed to this keen-eyed lawyer that Frank was in the neighborhood.

"I think, if he knew how much his wife was interested, he would give her his assistance," Lloyd said earnestly. "Mrs. Daunt. spare yourself any more pain and humiliation—for you must feel ashamed and humiliated by this continued deception of a husband whose greatest safeguard should be his trust and confidence in you. How can you betray them and him?

"I don't know," she answered drearily. "I can only hope that the shame and humiliation will kill me at last. You yourself have owned that a broken heart is not a myth. I don't look like a very long-lived woman, do I? And my mother died young. And if you care for Stephen you would be glad to hear that he was free again," she added, looking at him with a strange smile. "Shall I tell you how to free him? Go and tell him what you know, what you have discovered while he is still in ignorance of it. Tell him that the wife he trusts and esteems—although he does not love her—is disobeying his orders, is spending his money in an attempt to clear the man who was his rival for Sibyl Neil's love; tell him that he has been in the neighborhood, that his wife has met him by night and by day; betray us to him, so that he may put the officers of justice on Frank's track; and on the day you do so," she added firmly, with a look on the beautiful face which startled him, "I will find a way out of the difficulty without any man's help, or woman's either."

"Hush!" he said gently. "You speak wildly, and you do not know what you are saying. Why should I betray you to Stephen? I have no wish to add to your unhappiness and to his; it is sufficiently great, Heaven knows! Mr. Greville is safe from any interference of mine; but the risk he runs by coming here is a very great one, and his wisest plan is to do as he suggests here—go abroad while he has the opportunity. And your wisest plan, Mrs. Daunt," he added almost coldly, "is to give up your desire of seeing him cleared and to run no further risk. It is a wonder your imprudence has not already drought about the result you dread so much."

She made no reply. Her excitement was fading away now, and with it her strength. She sank down upon the nearest chair, breathing quickly, her pale lips parted like a person in pain. Suddenly Dolly's voice was heard in the hall without, and a gleam of terror crossed her ashy-pale face. Lloyd made a slight reassuring gesture with his hand, and hurried out of the room; and Sidney heard his voice speaking lightly to Dolly, saying how long she had been, so long that he had thought she must have been making the sketches herself. Then came

Why Mountain Air is Healthful.

One of the best qualities of mountain air, that which makes it so delightful to the weary denizens of plains, is its freshness, and the higher they go the fresher they find it. Swiss savants have ascertained by observations made a sundry Alpine stations that for every 143 metres of altitude the summer temperature of their mountains diminishes one degree centigrade.

The two great advantages of a mountain climate are the freshness of the air and the intensity of the sun's action. The second of these influences, as touching the human organism, is no less important than the first, for the solar radiation penetrates our clothing, comes in contact with the skin, and acts on the blood. A few weeks' stay at a height of 3,000 or 4,000 feet above sea level brings back color to the pallid face and dyes the cheeks a healthy brown.

But young women, sometimes even young men, instead of exposing their countenances to the healthful action of the light, shade their faces with hats and cover them with veils, as if the complexion most to be desired is of that delicate and wholesome tint which comes of late hours and an indoor life. Where can we find handsomer men than the ruddy-faced, dark-eyed Urner Strassenmann, who in the days before the big tunnel, used to keep the St. Gothard road free from snow, and spent his life at an elevation of from 5,000 to 7,000 feet above the sea. Their complexions were finer than that of any fashionable beauty who ever reigned in a ball room or shone at a court.

Another peculiarity of mountain air is the relatively little moisture which it contains. As we go higher the humidity diminishes in a ratio more rapid than the pressure of the atmosphere. When we reach an altitude of 6,500 feet we have below us one-half of the total amount of vapor our atmosphere is estimated to contain. The hygrometric condition of the air at these heights is subject to rapid changes. A fog, with its cold and damp, will often be dispersed in a few minutes by a whiff of warm air. Local cases may, however, render some mountains moister than others. For instance, the monks of the Great St. Bernard do not complain of the cold—that they can keep at bay—yet they suffer so much from rheumatism caused by the clouds that roll almost constantly round the Hospice, that after a few years' service they are compelled to go down the Martigny to recruit their health. But Mont Jou, from its position is much exposed to the action of the south wind, which comes charged with moisture from the north Italian plains. Health must be sought at a lower altitude than 8,000 feet.

A Good Word For The Turk.

This brings me now to a subject on which I must appeal to the public sense of justice and fair play. I must protest against the indiscriminate employment of the word "Turk," whenever there is occasion to mention any case of misgovernment, oppression, or cruelty in Egypt. It will probably surprise the reader very much to hear that, speaking generally, there are few, if any, Turks in that country. If proper inquiries were made about these Impoliteness of an Old Bachelor.

It was in a Pullman sleeping car in the middle of the night.

The passengers were all asleep but two. One of these, an elderly female, was moaning in an undertone:

"Oh, I am so dry, I am so dry, I am so very, very dry——"

She kept this monotonous cry up until the other wakeful passenger, an old bachelor in the berth opposite, grew wild. He got up, groped his way to the end of the car, where the porter was engaged in blacking boots, gave him a coin, and told him to take a pail of ice water to the old lady and see that she drank every drop of it. Then he got back into his berth.

The porter carried out his instructions, the old lady thanked him gratefully, and all was quiet.

Presently, and just as the old fellow was losing himself in sleep the same voice querulously piped out:

"Oh, I was so dry, I was so dry, I was so very, very dry——"

The bachelor passenger bounded to a sitting posture, bumped his head against the bottom of the berth above him, poked his face through the curtains, and shouted indignantly:

"My dear madam, will you be kind enough to dry up?"

Everything was ready and they were about starting for the picnic when a heavy rain-storm came on.

"We can't go in the rain," she continued, "but the folks are away, and if you like, George, we can spend the afternoon in the parlor. We will have it all to ourselves. You can hold a skein of worsted for me, and we can look at the album together, and I will show you some lovely sketches, and——"

"The parlor," interrupted George, leading the way.

In the evening a friend asked George where he had spent the afternoon.

"At a picnic," he replied.

"In all that rain? What kind of a picnic?"

"A regular picnic."

will probably surprise the reader very much to hear that, speaking generally, there are few, if any, Turks in that country. If proper inquiries were made about these so-styled Turkish Mudirs, and Turkish soldiers, who are so often referred to in terms of indignation and opprobrium, it would be found that they are mostly Egyptian natives, and although some few may have a dash of Turkish blood from a former generation as part of their inheritance, they have nothing in common with the Turk, as he is understood in England, except their Mohammedan faith. Very different are those men to those who serve the Sultan in the European or Asiatic Provinces, and it is unjust to both that they should be indiscriminately confounded in name. Turks there were in Egypt in the time of Mehemet Ali. Their presence and service was the essence of his strength; and it was with their assistance that he built up his power, and was able to bequeath a principality to his descendants. It was the policy, however, of his successors to get rid of this Turkish element or reduce it to a minimum in the government of the Province, seeing in it one of the strongest ties by which Egypt is bound to Turkey and consequently a great obstacle to the achievement of that independence which the heart of Said, as well as that of Ismail, so strongly longed for. It was a mistaken policy. The Turk, with his well-known fidelity and courage, was set aside, and the Fellah, with his subtlety, unscrupulousness, and cowardice came in, leading to the advance of Arabi Pasha, the bombardment of Alexandria, the battle of Tel-el-Kebir, and all the other evils with which the land of the Pharaohs is now again afflicted, and for which England will in history be made to bear the onus and the disgrace, unless by following the spirit of the national proclivities and tastes she stops in time and retrieves her fair name by generously admitting the errors so far committed and by at once adopting the remedy which will bear out her professions of friendly intentions while consistently acting with due regard to her acknowledged just interests.—[Blackwood's Magazine.

New Bread Did Not Agree with Him

"Will you please give me a crust of stale bread without any butter on it?" pleaded a tramp.

The woman looked at him pityingly.

"Why, my poor fellow," she said, "you might ask for something better than that. I can give you some nice fresh bread, just baked, if you would rather have it."

"No," he replied, waving his hand sadly, "such things are not for me. There was a time when——but ah! never mind. I'm a man whose ambition is gone, and who has accepted hope's defeat. Besides, I'm troubled with indigestion."

Science and religion each box the compass. An Italian scientist more than two hundred years ago taught that organic life does not originate by spontaneous generation. The theologians opposed the dictum by bringing forward the statement that the carcass of Samson's lion generated bees.

The Rhenish missionaries on the Toba lake, Sumatra, came near being exterminated in the disturbances of that country. A considerable amount of missionary property was destroyed.

During the recess M. Ferry has strained the powers of the Government to the utmost, and it is doubtful if he can persuade the Deputies to see the wisdom of his actions regarding China. A temporary coalition is spoken of between the Orleanists, Legitimists, and Bonapartists, to censure the Government, which would mean the defeat of the present ministry.

HOW TO LIVE WELL.—To live well, economy is necessary. No matter if persons are rich or have large incomes, they should be economical; for to waste is wicked. Many people would be economical, if they knew how, but the practice of economy is an art. Many people use expensive articles of food and dress when cheaper ones would be in every way better and more serviceable. Especially in regulating table-expenses is there great want of economy. A little information concerning the qualities of food, the amount of nutritive matter they contain, the wants of the human system, and the best way of cooking, would often save fully one-third, and, in many instances, half the expense. A wise economy in table-expenses is favorable to health, and thus prevents doctor's bills, and conduces to strength and happiness.

WORN-OUT MEN.—Life is too short to waste either in idleness or overwork. Some men work too little, and lose their health by inactivity—by the lack of sufficie t exertion to keep the body in good condition. Others ruin their constitutions by over-work; and among this class are the thrifty business men, who, in their prosperous career, are making money so rapidly that they begrudge the time for a little necessary recreation. All their lives are spent in devising ways and means to increase their store of this world's goods; and thus from year to year they go on, the waste of strength and vitality being so gradual and imperceptible to themselves that they are unmindful of it until it is too late for diversion to effect any permanent improvement. Then, utterly worn out, they withdraw from active business for a few weeks or months, and learn to their sorrow that they have deferred the period of enjoyment too long.

Three Kinds of Shoes.

Nothing can be so injurious to a growing girl's foot as to put it into a shoe pointed at the toe, thereby turning the great toe inward, and producing one of the greatest plagues of life—corns, or, worse still, bunions. Young children should invariably wear straight shoes, with "elastic waists," as they are called, giving play to the muscles, and which in adults permits the wearer to walk long distances without fatigue. If heels are used at all; they should be low There are three kinds of boots and shoes—those that are made purely on hygienic principles, without any consideration as to fashion; those that are purely fashionable, and the happy medium that combines the two. I should suggest to my readers to consult their interests by turning their attention to the third-class, for it is decidedly the right path. There are some new inventions in water-proof soles, some new pegged soles for running shoes, and many for the riders on bicycles and tricycles. The 'cyclist shoe seeme to combine all the merits required, for it prevents slipping, and gives a powerful grip on the treadle, enabling the wearer to ride up hill with comparative ease. An excellent invention is the damp-proof boot sole, which consists of a light metal plate, or skeleton frame, provided with solid projections, or teeth, which are forced into and through the outer sole from the upper side, and are thus permanently imbedded in the leather. It is an inexpensive article, and suitable for all descriptions of boots and shoes, and perfectly pliable to the motion of the foot. The sole is prevented from running over, and the upper kept in shape without the inconvenience of heavy nailed boots, They are light and indestructible.—Cassell's Magazine.

Some Interesting Statistics.

A journal devoted to insurance interests prints some statistics regarding suicides in the United States during the six months ending with August. From these figures it appears that a man is three times as likely to commit suicide as a woman; that the period of his greatest danger is his thirty-fifth year; that the chances are more than two to one that if he kills himself the deed will be done in the night; that the latter half of each month is a perilous fortnight to him than the first half; and that the probability of his being driven to self destruction more by disappointment in love is slightly greater than that of his coming to a like end through dissipation. The moral of this last comparison is susceptible of reenforcement by bringing in the fact that dissipation frequently leads to insanity, and that the chances of a man dying by his own hand while insane are as three to two to the chances that the cause of his suicide will be either an affair of the heart or devotion to the bottle. There were more suicides in the spring of the year than in any other spring covered by these statistics. In the summer the number fell below the usual summer average; but the fall opened with an alarming ratio, which promises to make the number of suicides for the year somewhat larger than that for 1883. The usual annual average in this country is about thirty-two per mil-

Count Von Moltke at Ragatz

At the little village of Ragatz, situated on the Chur and Zurich line of railway, and in the Canton of St. Gall, there is sojourning at the present moment one of the greatest military geniuses the world has known. Marshal von Moltke arrived in Switzerland a few days ago, in order that he might take the waters of the famous Ragatz springs. His only retinue consisted of two soldier servants, and his personal baggage might easily have been carried in a child's wheelbarrow, A London morning paper recently stated that the renowned German strategist was mentally and physically broken up. This is not the case for, save in those signs, which must accompany 84 years of age—he having been born on the 26th of October, 1800—Count von Moltke presents no special symptoms of decay, while his intellect is clear, bright, and unimpaired. A tall man, somewhat bowed, with a rugaged face, keen, deep-set eyes, overhung by shaggy eye brows, a massive forehead, and a firm, soldierly tread, von Moltke would be conspicious even among thousands of other conspicious figures. In his manner and habits he is as simple and frugal as was the great Duke of Wellington, and he has a horror of being made a show of. Naturally taciturn, it is seldom he enters into conversation, especially with strangers, and meet him when you will he always seems to be wrapt in thought. He rises early and goes unattended to the Quellenhof, where the waters are drank. Having taken the first glass, as by rule prescribed, he folds his hands behind his back and paces up and down, watching with keen interest the water drinkers, and smiling occasionally as some tyro, taking his first dose, pucker his face up in disgust at the strong sulphurous fumes. These waters rise in Pfaffer's Gorge, three miles away. It is one of the most remarkable gorges in the whole of Switzerland. The furious River Tamina has carved a way for itself through a stupendous defile. In no place is this chasm more than twelve feet wide, while overhead the rocks meet, a few openings here and there admitting the light. Below the river boils with incredible fury, and so terrific and unearthly seems the noise, owing to the reverberations and echoes, that a visitor for the first time can scarcely repress a feeling of alarm. On one side of this weird cavern a wooden gallery about 80 yards in length has been built, being supported by means of iron brackets let into the perpendicular wall of rock. He who would traverse this gallery with a dry skin must clothe himself from head to foot in mackintosh, for the water pours down from above in endless streams. The hot springs bubbles up from the floor of a cavern at the end of the gallery, and run into an enormous reservoir. The cavern is hot, and the fumes of the sulphur so strong, that the curious visitor, being apprehensive of asphyxia, beats a hasty retreat. From the gorge the waters are conveyed by means of conduits to the village, and owing to the great fall and the rapidity with the water flows, it arrives at its destination with the loss of only a very few degrees of heat. It is a very powerful sulphur and iron water, and is said to work miracles in cases of rheuma-

AYER'S PILLS.

A large proportion of the diseases which cause human suffering result from derangement of the stomach, bowels, and liver. The Chinese Cabinet Maker.

I noticed a door and a window in a court-yard with a very original lattice. I had succeeded in getting a few similar ones, and when time failed me I rubbed black all over a sheet of paper, and then applied it to the lattice, thus obtaining a faithful life-size copy. The Chinese paper being strong, although fine, was eminently suitable to this sort of drawing, and also to copying inscriptions on stones or walls. Not having any such paper about me, I begged a Chinese to and fetch some for me, which he did with alacrity, and when I explained what I was going to do, he ran and got me a stool, that I might reach the window with greater facility. Some of them held it all the time for me, and when they inquired why I was doing this, I told them that the design was very beautiful, and that I desired to have a window like it in my own house. This pleased and flattered them greatly, and to enhance the merits of their town they told me the artist was a native cabinet-maker; some of them even ran to fetch him. I complimented him on his work, but he was very modest about it. I then tore a sheet of paper out of my note-book, and, to leave him a remembrance, sketched my own likeness and offered it for his acceptance. The on-lookers recognized the drawing and uttered exclamations of approval. The cabinet-maker ran off with it, greatly delighted, accompanied by a crowd of admirers. I only mention this fact to prove how easy it is to disarm the distrust and hostility of a Chinese crowd. —A Russian Through China.

SHOCKING CRIME IN INDIANA.

A Woman Murdered and Decapitated. Her Husband and Son Lynched.

A horrible crime has been brought to light at Troy, Ind., by the finding of the headless body of a woman in a cistern on the farm of Peter Backer. The body was nude. The head was found in a thicket a hundred yards from the cistern. The body, which was that of a portly woman, weighing about 160 pounds, and of about 40 years of age, was yet warm when taken from the water. There was a deep gash below the shoulder blade, as though made with an axe, and a wound on the forehead, evidently made with some blunt instrument. The body was taken to Troy, when it was recognized as that of Mrs. Stilwell Hindershot, who resided on a farm fourteen miles back of Troy.

A neighbor of Hindershot, while in Tell City, saw the murdered woman's husband. He also noticed a valise marked "T. H. Hindershot." While the steamer Droillard was at Troy a search warrant was procured and the valise opened and found to contain clothing of the victim covered with blood. Warrants were immediately issued for the arrest of Stilwell Hindershot, the woman's husband, and T. H. and William Hindershot, their sons. The old man and his son William were arrested and taken to Troy. The elder son refused to come and defied arrest. An increased posse was sent after him, and he was brought to Troy and placed in jail. He acknowleges committing the crime himself, but says his father and brother had nothing to do with it. The old man's testimony seems to throw the weight of the crime upon himself and the elder son. The murder of Mrs. Hindershot arose from her refusal to sign away the farm, to which she had a deed in fee simple, which the father and son wanted to dispose of.

Several hundred persons were present at the trial, and about noon an effort was made to seize the criminals and mete out summary vengeance on them; but the officers succeeded in averting the attack. The result of the preliminary trial was the release of William. The other brother and father were remanded to jail.

At 7 o'clock the mob at Troy took the eldest son out of jail and hanged him to a beam in the barn where the crime was committed. He made a confession that his father shot his mother and that he cut her head off with an axe.

Catarrh—A New Treatment.

Perhaps the most extraordinary success that has been achieved in modern science has been attained by the Dixon Treatment of catarrh. Out of 2,000 patients treated during the past six months, fully ninety per cent. have been cured of this stubborn malady. This is none the less startling when it is remembered that not five per cent. of the patients presenting themselves to the regular practitioner are benefitted, while the patent medicines and other advertised cures never record a cure at all. Starting with the claim now generally believed by the most scientific men that the disease is due to the presence of living parasites in the tissues, Mr. Dixon at once adapted his cure to their extermination; this accomplished the catarrh is practically cured, and the permanency is unquestioned, as cures effected by him four years ago are cures still. No one else has ever attempted to cure catarrh in this manner, and no other treatment has ever cured catarrh. The application of the remedy is simple and can be done at home, and the present season of the year is the most favorable for a speedy and permanent cure the majority of cases being cured at one treatment. Sufferers should correspond with Messrs. A. H. DIXON & SON, 305 King-street West, Toronto, Canada, and enclose stamp for their treatise on catarrh.—Montreal Star.

—On Monday last Lewis Monbreaud and George Martin had a row in a bagnio kept by one Mrs. Watson near the station. Martin had his adversary before ex-Mayor James, who fined Monbreaud $10 and costs. The fellow paid $6 and then skipped the town.

—In conversation with people living along Hay Bay, we are credibly informed over 1,000 rods of gil net, besides a large quantity of hoop net, is constantly set out from both shores, so it is next to an impossibility for a fish to get up to the head of the bay without getting caught. The nets extend from Thompson's Point to the head of the bay. The Bay is always the spawning ground for fish, and in a few years the fish will all be destroyed unless something is done to prevent such wholesale slaughter of the finny tribes.

—A correspondent of the Belleville Ontario writes as follows of the birthday dinner to Mr. John Huffman, of Sidney, by his children and grandchildren, on Oct. 23rd: "Nearly forty sat down to a sumptuous repast, comprising all the delicacies of the season, after which the Rev. Hiram Williams, in a very touching manner, addressed Mr. and Mrs. Huffman and presented them each with a beautiful silver cup and saucer, a gift from their children. It being a complete surprise, Mr. Huffman was not prepared with a speech, although he very feelingly replied. Mr. Huffman is quite smart, having been out that morning and done some plowing, although his eyesight seems to be failing. Several guests from a distance were present and enjoyed themselves exceedingly. It was the unanimous wish of all present that he may be spared to see many more anniversaries." —On Monday Mr. J. W. Dorland was taking a load of bees out to Richmond and got almost on the railway track at the Selby crossing before he discovered a passing engine. The horses got frightened and dashed into the ditch upsetting four skips of bees off the waggon and smashing the boxes, doing some $30 damage, besides himself getting stung and a sprained foot. Mr. D. threatens to bring an action for damages on account of the engineer not ringing the bell and sounding the whistle at the crossings according to their printed rules. A good skip contains 15,000 bees. Just think of four hives being released all primed for battle. Wilkie says engagement was a hot one while it lasted, but he kept the field and drove the enemy six miles into fort.

announced the arrival of Miss Florence Marryat at Boston. She will make her first appearance in America there. This lady has been engaged to give an entertainment in the Opera House here, under the auspices of the English Church Union, on Nov. 25th. We understand that arrangements are being made to have a special train run, in order to accommodate the people in the villages along the line, desirous of seeing this great artiste. —The young men of St. Patrick's R. C. Church have presented the congregation with a magnificent new organ. A meeting of the young men of the parish was held last Friday evening, when it was decided to hold a grand concert in Symington's Opera House on the first week of December, to assist in raising funds to pay for the organ. Negotiations are in progress with a number of the leading singers and dramatic artists of the province, and as the matter is in competent hands the public may expect a fine programme. The object is laudable on the part of the young men and they deserve encouragement.

—The combination coal cook is ahead of any stove in the market, bar none. Don't buy until you see them at Boyle & Son's.

—A very interesting and instructive lecture, under the auspices of the scientific branch of the English Church Union, was delivered before a fair audience in the school room of St. Mary Magdalene's Church here, on Wednesday last, by the Rev. Mr. Fyles, of Montreal, subject: "Our Insect Friends and Insect Foes." The lecture was illustrated by numerous colored drawings and by natural objects, and was listened to with great attention by the audience. The chair was occupied by His Honor Judge Wilkison, President of the Union, and at the close a vote of thanks was tendered the able lecturer on motion of ex-Mayor James, seconded by Dr. Ward. This was the first of a series of entertainments which the Union intend holding during the coming winter, and we trust our citizens will extend them every encouragement in their laudable efforts to provide the public with sound and wholesome entertainments.

—It will be remembered that two weeks ago complaint was laid before Mr. C. James, J.P., by Robt. McGee, of South Fredericksburgh, against some parties in Belleville who have on two occasions recently visited Hay Bay and desecrated the Sabbath by fishing and shooting. Being unable to ascertain the names of the parties the owners of the steam yacht in which they came were summoned. Those who appeared were Mr. T. S. Carman, Mr. E. Potts and Mr. John Lake. The two former proved an alibi and were dismissed, but Lake in his evidence having admitted that he was one of the transgressors, and could not remember the names of the others, the case was adjourned till Saturday in order to give him an opportunity to refresh his memory. When the case came up again Lake was fined $40 and $7.50 costs. The others evidently fearing that they might be similarly dealt with caused information to be laid against themselves before Mr. J. J. Watson, J. P., at Adolphustown, and the cases were heard on the 22nd, when each was fined $1 and $1.50 costs. The names are: John Henderson, F. S. Campbell, R. Yarwood, Jas. H. Starling, S. K. Balkwell, C. Corby James Edgar, R. M. Roy, W. H. Biggar, John Stewart, and Samuel Spangenburgh. The contrast in between the two fines is very striking, and is somewhat in favor of the Napanee administrator of the law. It is reported that Messrs. Carman and Potts intend entering actions against the party who caused them to be summoned.

the anti-Scott Act party have forwarded a petition to the Government asking them to delay action, on the ground that many of the petitioners are not duly qualified voters.

Preparing for a Hard Year.

Mr. E. McKenty, of Bath, has issued a circular to his customers and the people of the bay section, in which he quotes all kinds of goods at prices that cannot be beaten. Rare bargains are offered in ready-made clothing, ordered clothing, furs, etc. Silver Star coal oil is quoted at 16 cents a gallon. He has an experienced cutter and milliner on the premises, and in these departments he can compete with the town and city establishments. Mr. McKenty is an energetic business man who always keeps pace with the time. He concludes his circular by saying that as this is a hard year he has made up his mind to sell goods cheaper than ever before. Give him a call.

Day of Thanksgiving, November 6th.

Thursday next being the day appointed as a day of National Thanksgiving for the blessings of Providence bestowed on our country during the year past, there will be two special services in the Church of St. Mary Magdalene (free seat). The first will be at 11 a. m., and consist of a celebration of the Holy Communion, the Christian Sacrifice of Praise and Thanksgiving, and in the evening at 7:30 o'clock a choral service with special anthem, etc. The Archdeacon will preach at both services. It is hoped that all members of the church, who have many mercies to be grateful for this year, will attend at least one of these services and make suitable thank-offering.

Hymeneal.

A happy hymeneal event was consummated at St. Martin's Church, Montreal, on Wednesday morning, in the union of Mr. F. E. McGreer, of this town, and Miss deMesle, of that city. The groom was supported by Mr. W. T. Thompson, of the Merchants' Bank, Napanee, and the bride, who was elegantly attired and looked charming, by her sister. After the ceremony, a recherche wedding breakfast was served at the residence of the bride's father, at which a large number of guests was present. The happy couple shortly afterwards left the city for a short tour through the northern states, and will arrive in Napanee next Monday. Mr. McGreer is one of our most estimable young men and we trust that his wedded life will be "a long and happy one."

To the Farmers.

We wish to thank all of our customers for their liberal patronage during the past four years. In doing so, we feel confident we have given general satisfaction, because we have honestly endeavored to meet the wants of every farmer by supplying only the best implements in the market. As all of our accounts are due on the 1st Novmber, we hope every one indebted to us will come forward promptly and settle the same. Several have called with the money before the accounts were due, thus earning our esteem and gratitude. We have large payments to meet next month, and if our customers settle promptly it will enable us to retain our credit as well as theirs and make matters pleasant for all concerned.

Yours truly,

DROWNED IN HAY BAY.

Sad Fate of a Duck Hunter from Belleville.

Early Friday morning as Mr. Ephraim Wagar and a neighbor were duck shooting on Hay Bay they discovered a capsized boat, and on close inspection they found the body of a man underneath entangled among a lot of decoys, which kept it afloat. They conveyed it to the shore where it was identified by Mr. R. S. Bell, of the Belleville Intelligencer, who was fishing in the vicinity, as that of Mr. James Clark, druggist of Belleville. Mr. Bell at first supposed that Mr. Frank Campbell, who was in company with the deceased a few days before, was also drowned and the news was promptly telegraphed to Belleville. The report of Mr. Campbell's death was promptly denied, he being safe in Belleville. It then transpired that Mr. Clark's companion was Mr. Frederick Dewsberry and they came to Hay Bay on Tuesday in the yacht Iolanthe. They started out early Friday morning in separate boats to go to a landing to secure permission to shoot on Hay Bay when the fatal accident occurred. In the darkness Dewsberry, on reaching the shore, discovered that they had landed some distance below the house, and the boats were shoved out. Arriving at the landing spot Dewsberry started to the house to awaken the man, shouting to Mr. Clark, "All right, Jim, come on." Clarke answered, "All right, Pine, old boy, I'll be there," These were the last words he heard from the deceased, who then appeared to be only a few feet from the shore, paddling in about two and a half feet of water. Many theories have been advanced as to the cause of the accident, the most likely of which is that, rising in his boat he made a false step and was precipitated into the water. Under ordinary circumstances the deceased could have extricated himself, but impeded as he was by two heavy overcoats the pockets of which were filled with loaded cartridges, the weight was too much to be overcome. The deceased was 35 years of age and head of the firm of Clarke & Co., druggists, Belleville. He was for several years Commondore of the Bay of Quinte Yacht Club, an office he held with credit alike to the club and himself. He was unmarried. The funeral took place on Sunday in Belleville, and was largely attended.

A Fine Grocery and Provision Store.

Mr. Sam. McLaughlin is now comfortably settled in his new store, which is probably the best appointed grocery and provision house in the county. The store has a fine plate glass front, which affords an attractive window display, and the premises are a model of neatness. The stock, which is large and varied, is displayed to good advantage. In the rear is a large store room where pork is cut up and conveyed to the cellar by an elevator which runs from the third storey to the basement, and there it is cured. The basement, which is large, airy, well lighted and perfectly dry, is also used for storing potatoes and roots of various kinds, which are conveyed to the ground floor by spouts. The third floor is used as a general storeroom for teas, groceries, etc. The goods are all raised by the elevator which has a capacity of 2,000 pounds, and works like a charm. It was manufactured in Toronto. Mr. McLaughlin is to be congratulated on the success attending his business here. Only a few years ago he commenced business in a very small way, and by his industry and perseverance he has worked up to its present large di-

Cruelly Murdered.

In the Province of Ontario every year thousands are being slowly murdered by taking unsuitable, untried nostrums for such complaints as Costiveness, Indi- gestion, Liver Complaint, Kidney Troubles, etc., who might easily gain lost strength and energy by using McGregor's Speedy Cure. To convince them that such is the case we will give them a free trial bottle at T. A. Huffman's and at A. T. Grange's drug stores, Napanee; also, at James Aylsworth's drug store, Tamworth.

ANNOUNCEMENT

We have much pleasure in the opportunity afforded in thanking our customers for the very generous patronage extended us for the season just past, and for the general appreciation accorded us in our efforts to furnish them FARMING IMPLEMENTS EXCELLED BY NONE in design, convenience of handling and capacity for thorough work.

We propose as hitherto to embody those principles of thorough and progressive workmanship in all our manufactures, and for the season of 1886 we trust to merit a still larger share of your confidence and patronage by placing before you a line of Implements superior to anything yet offered in these counties. Besides the list of articles which it has been our pleasure to offer to the farming community, we have at a considerable expense secured the right to manufacture a SELF-BINDER.

Believing there will be a demand in this section for such an article we have anticipated the same and will add to our list of manufactures a superior binder for the coming season. The Binder we will make has been thoroughly tested in the field, and is in the estimation of many the best binder in the province. We will have this Binder ready for inspection in a few weeks, and farmers who contemplate purchasing a Binder will do well to give us a call and inspect the same.

Do not neglect to give us a call of inspection when in want of any implement of husbandry.

—The Mechanics' Institute is being generally patronized by everyone. The rush for books is very encouraging to the directors.

—The Dramatic Association expects to present another play to the public about Easter.

—The Bay of Quinte Railway handled in January the equivalent of 177 cars of freight. It was one of the best monthly exhibits in the history of the road.

—The schools of Tyendinaga Reserve have been reopened and the Board of Health authorities now consider that after the premises on Eagle Hill have been well disinfected next week all danger of small-pox will be removed.

—Deseronto has now a regularly officered fire brigade. The need of such an organization was made palpably evident at the recent fire in the Goodmurphy block, and no doubt the newly formed brigade will soon become most efficient in its work.

—At a special meeting of Deseronto Lodge I. O. O. F., held on Saturday evening, 6th inst., it was resolved to tender the use of the lodge room to the members of Craig Lodge A. F. & A. M., until they could secure a hall of their own. This kindly and thoughtful offer has been accepted by the Masonic brethren who most fully appreciate the kindness of their Oddfellow brethren.

—The usual quarterly meeting was held in the Methodist Church last Sabbath. There was a large congregation who listened attentively to the Rev. Mr. Robinson's interesting discourse.

—Mrs. M. C. Tooker of Brockville, who was called upon to attend the funeral of her brother, Mr. T. Irish of Morven, spent a few days with her sister, Mrs. Neilson, of this place.

—Miss Bertha Storms of Napanee spent a few days with her parents.

—Mrs. S. B. Lake of Denison, Texas, who has been visiting friends in Trenton for the past few weeks, has returned to her sister's.

—Quite a large audience assembled at the Presbyterian Church Sunday evening, but were disappointed as no minister came. The cause is not known. Their disappointment, however, was partly abated by the excellent music of the choir.

——Miss Emma Lapum has gone to Kingston to spend a few weeks visiting friends.

—Mrs. Dr. Aylsworth of Newburgh is stopping at Mr. Nelson Lapum's.

[From another Correspondent.]

—MR. EDITOR.—As your fair correspondent did not favour your valuable paper last week with an account of the tea-meeting held at this place on the 10th inst., I feel that its my duty to give you a brief synopsis of one of the best and most successful tea-meetings we have ever had in this village. Great credit is due the committee for the extra effort they put forth in supplying choice bodily and mental food. Our popular pastor, the Rev. Mr. Robinson, occupied the chair, and filled that honourable position corporeally and mentally to the satisfaction of his numerous friends. Among the gifted orators that favored us with their presence the ministerial element largely predominated. Our highly esteemed friend and former pastor, the Rev. Mr. Gibson of Wolfe Island met with a hearty reception, and feelingly referred to his itinerancy on the Wilton Circuit. The eloquent addresses delivered by the Revs. Curts of Newburgh, Thompson of Odessa, Jewell of Morven, and Bates of Yarker, were full of interest and abounded with bursts of eloquence that were fully appreciated by the large, respectable and well fed audience. One of the leading attractions of the evening was the musical programme provided. Mrs. Rockwell of Kingston gave some choice selections of vocal music. Her —A large crowd assembled at the residence of Mr. John Brown on Monday night where they had a most enjoyable time. Dancing was commenced early in the evening and kept up until the "wee sma' hours in the morning." The host and hostess did ample honour to the guests and everything passed off pleasantly.

THE SCHOOLS.—Our public school is in able hands, and its pupils are making great progress under Mr. A. Martyn as principal, Miss Bellows as teacher of second department, and Miss Annie Price as instructress of the 3rd department. The staff is an excellent one.

—Mr. C. Cummins is in receipt of a fine lot of new calicos and ginghams for common dresses for ladies. They are neat in design and are sure to please. Owing to the dullness of the times his stock of dress goods have not sold as readily as in former years, and as an inducement to purchasers he now offers these goods at a slight shade over the actual cost price. This is a rare opportunity for the fair sex to clothe themselves at wholesale prices.

—Mr. Thomas Bain, the delegate of Bath Lodge, A.O.U.W., 183, went west on Monday to attend the sittings of the grand lodge.

—Mr. John Shibley has gone to St. Louis as carriage trimmer. He served his apprenticeship with Mr. T. A. Seaward of this place, an experienced workmen.

—Mr. Robt. McDonald, proprietor of the Tichborne House at Napanee, was with us on Tuesday. He was accompanied by Mr. Jamieson of Deseronto.

—Mr. Michael O'Rourke, late of Gananoque, is the guest of Mr. Duncan Wemp.

—A fracas occurred on Thursday between a little Englishman from fifth town with pink whiskers, and an athlete belonging to the suburbs. They were "thirsten" for gore, but nary a drop was spilled.

—Mr. D. W. Ball, the energetic and pushing agent of the Mercautile Fire Association of Watertown, has gone home for a few days to enjoy a rest.

—Messrs. Edwards, Laird and Mills are putting up each "anice" house this spring. This shows plainly that Bath is progressing.

—Bill Storms, lately of Dakota, skipped between two days for the other side. Some parties of Camden East mourn the absence of a coat.

—Tuesday evening the Lodge of I.O.G.T. were entertained by the brethren to an oyster spread in return for similar favors of a recent date.

—Look out for fun, Town Hall, March 5th, 11 a.m. Lydia will present the side-splitting farce, entitled "How to make out Amherst Island.

—The annual missionary meeting of the Church of England was held in St. James' Church on Tuesday evening, the 9th inst., and in Christ's Church on Wednesday evening. There was a fair attendance each night, and appropriate remarks were made by the Rev. Mr. Roberts, who, on both occasions, introduced the Rev. Mr. Cooke, of St. George's cathedral, Kingston. Mr. Nesbitt, who had been appointed by the bishop, was unavoidedly absent through indisposition, but his place was ably filled by Mr. Cooke, who made a very good impression, and pointed out the great need of funds, hoping the parish would make fresh efforts and contribute half as much more as formerly given. It would require this from each parish in the diocese in order to meet the demands now incumbent upon it. The collections were about $31.

—The Salvation Army from Bath have applied to the council to rent them the township hall to hold meetings, and are expected over soon.

—The glee club of Bath gave a very interesting entertainment on Friday in the hall, of dialogues, songs, readings and recitation. Owing to the thaw there was not a large crowd, but those present were fully satisfied. It was admitted to have been one of the best entertainments ever held on the Island.

—The roads on the island are almost rendered impassible since the thaw, and the ice is not much improvement on them. Horses break through the upper crust.

—George Henderson and his family have left the island and taken up their quarters at Kingston.

—Three marriages are talked of. This will help to dissipate the lethargy of our residents that has prevailed here most of the winter owing to the poor price of the markets and left us all in a state of despondency.

Piety Hill.

[Correspondence of THE EXPRESS.]

—Our little hamlet, though unimportant in size, is not unknown to fame. It is perched on a ledge of rock overlooking the paper mills and the road winding round the foot of the hill. We look down into the farmers' sleighs passing by and see over the beautiful country. Our little community has its little history as have other communities, big and little. It has had its deaths and its weddings, its sorrowings and rejoicings. Tremulous voices tell of the loss of near friends. Years ago the place may have earned its name as a term of reproach but now the name is unmerited. Perhaps not even in the better sense. For though our people are as industrious and large hearted as any to be found on other hills in Canada, I cannot say that we get off long prayers by the hour, but believing that "He prayeth best who loveth best all things both great and small."

—In your last week's Napanee Mills correspondence "parties desirous of a business education" are told to "apply at the new Business College, Piety Hill—McGill, Principal." Several young men in this neigh-abounded with bursts of eloquence that were fully appreciated by the large, respectable and well fed audience. One of the leading attractions of the evening was the musical programme provided. Mrs. Rockwell of Kingston gave some choice selections of vocal music. Her singing was remarkably fine and a musical treat that we highly prized. The music, both vocal and instrumental, by the Methodist choir, was well worthy of the enconiums it received. The provisions were both excellent in quality and abundant in quantity. JULIUS.

Forest Mills.

[Correspondence of THE EXPRESS.]

—The second annual meeting of the Forest Mills Cheese Company was held at this place on Friday last. It was largely attended, Mr. Elijah Storr occupying the chair as usual. After some little time was spent in routine work for the coming season, the same officers were re-elected with a slight increase in their salaries, Mr. Storr agreeing to act as treasurer and salesman; Mr. Alex. Hewitt, secretary; Mr. Frank Brennan, the cheese-maker and owner of the factory agreeing to paying their salaries in full, only $50 being paid by him last year. The different milk routes were not sold; they will probably be sold privately. The large business of the factory will be considerably increased during the coming season as several new names were noticed on the book. We understand that the cheese made in this factory last season stood second to none. As a cheese-maker Mr. Brennan is a success.

—A few evenings ago a gay and joyous party of ladies and gentlemen went for a sleigh ride. It was a beautiful warm night, a pale young moon shedding its soft mellow light and casting weird shadows athwart the snow covered fields. The party's spirits were several degrees above zero, and they sang gaily accompanied by the merry chime of the sleigh bells, and indeed a jolly lot they were, there being only thirteen of them all told, packed in one sleigh box. Their destination was the home of James Boyd on the 9th concession of Richmond. They arrived there without any mishap. Spending several hours in harmless amusement, such as playing post office and the revised edition of wild Irishman, the horses were once more brought to the door and stood pawing the snow and champing their bits anxious to be off. After some little delay the cheerful party was stowed away in the now groaning sleigh box and the horses started on the homeward course, tossing their heads proudly. Gay and pleasant repartee was the order of the moment, when lo! in coming suddenly into a pitch hole the sleigh was suddenly capsized and the whole party thrown promiscuously into a huge snow bank. The ladies screamed and the men looked dumb-founded. One young lady after extricating herself from a large pile of snow with difficulty, stood up in the centre of the road and said in tones that had a world of pathos in them, "I am going to faint, I know I am." Meanwhile, after dragging their driver some distance the horses sped away like two frightened antelopes, leaving the lucky or rather unlucky number of thirteen to pick themselves out of the snow as best they could. But just when everything looked dark and gloomy and they were about commencing to select the shortest way to foot it across the fields to their respective homes, one of the men who had followed the flying steeds halloed to them to come on that they had captured the chargers, and sure enough a short distance in advance, where the road made a sharp curve into Martin Dewitt's field, the horses were found stuck in a large drift. They had failed to make the turn to the great joy of the whole party. But the party didn't sing any more on the way home; their nerves were too badly shaken.

—In your last week's Napanee Mills correspondence "parties desirous of a business education" are told to "apply at the new Business College, Piety Hill—McGill, Principal." Several young men in this neighbourhood who have seen penmanship executed by the gentleman above referred to have been urging him to start a night school for instruction in penmanship and book-keeping which he has consented to do. Such an intimation by your correspondent would have been kind as well as just. The gentleman in question fails to see that he has deserved the slur conveyed by the article in your correspondence. He thinks that he has not been pretentious in the matter of the proposed school, and that if there is blame deserving of public censure that it attaches equally as much to the parties who advised the starting of the school as to himself. The gentleman is comparatively a stranger here and in these hard times is struggling to support his little family by honourable means. He is sure that if his unknown friend had known him better the unkind reference would have been spared.

Presentation to John Herring, Esq.

Wednesday last was the 68th birthday of Mr. John Herring, and as that gentleman was sitting in his office at 6 o'clock, pondering, probably, on the glories of the past and making new plans for the future, he was "surprised" by the entrance of the entire staff of workmen, headed by Mr. Wm. Allen, an employee of thirty years standing, followed by Mr. Chas. Ashton, who carried in his hand a formidable looking manuscript. The object of the visit was at once disclosed by Mr. Ashton reading the following

ADDRESS.

To John Herring, Esq.:

DEAR SIR,—We, the undersigned, on behalf of your employees in the town of Napanee, are desirous of wishing you many happy returns of this your natal day and expressing the hope that you may long be spared to enjoy the profits arising from your ability and industry in an active commercial life. We feel, sir, that the successful building up and prosperity of Napanee has been in no small measure due to you, and we congratulate ourselves in being so fortunate as to be in the employ of one who's reputation as a careful and thorough-going business man is not confined to our own town and county, knowing as we do that the reputation is well deserved.

You, sir, have not been backward in lending your valuable services in the town and county councils, and we beg to express the wish that the day is not far distant when we may again see you or a representative in your family looking after the interests of our town at the council board.

As it has pleased Almighty God to spare your life these 68 years we think this a suitable opportunity for presenting you with this cane, not as a reminder of the number of years you have lived, but as a mark of the esteem in which you are held by all in your employ. We trust, sir, you may long be spared to your family and that in the future, as in the past, our relations as employer and employees will continue on the same pleasant footing, assuring you, sir, that we will do all in our power to aid you in the various branches of the business that you may see fit to entrust us with.

Again extending to you our best wishes and wishing you many happy returns of the day.

We are, sir, truly yours,

WM. ALLEN,
CHAS. ASHTON.

The cane, which was of ebony, with a handsome gold head, was presented on behalf of the employees by Mr. Wm. Allen. Mr. Herring was completely taken by surprise. He said he was exceedingly gratified at the manifestation of their good will and trusted that they and he might long continue to work together for mutual benefit. He thanked them most sincerely for their handsome present upon which he placed a high value. The men then gave three cheers for Mr. Herring and retired. The tribute to Mr. Herring was well deserved. He is one of our most enterprising citizens and a large employer of labor. We join most heartily with his employees in wishing him long life

CHAPTFR XXIX.

THE TERRORS OF THE MOUNTAIN TOMBS.

As he spoke the scorpion eater pointed to a vast fissure that at that point perforated the side of the mountain, but which was almost hidden by a luxuriant growth of creeping plants bearing great waxen-looking flowers.

"Have no fear, they are very tame," was the now thoroughly cowed scorpion eater's answer, and the next minute the entire party had plunged into the profound darkness of the mountain tomb. Nellie, to her no small terror, for the pitchy blackness was well calculated to inspire that feeling.

As for Pat Monaghan, he was a man of few words, or, when they could be conveniently spared, of no words at all; but this may not have prevented him from thinking a great deal, and it would have been wonderful, indeed, if under the circumstances his thoughts had been pleasant.

These mountains had, indeed, more than once been pointed out to him from the ramparts that surrounded the Citadel of Cairo as the haunt of the Djins or Evil Genii and the Spirits or Giant Devils, who, with their powerful breaths, blow up the desert sands until they overtake and bury travelers beneath them, and who are, furthermore, the guardians of buried treasure. So remembering these tales just when he would have most liked to have forgotten them, Pat Monaghan was not quite so comfortable in his own mind as when he had ridden back to encounter with his single arm the three camel and dromedary riders.

Great was his relief therefore when, after they had ridden a little way through the subterranean, trusting entirely to their horses to follow the one that led, he heard a muttered "Halt!" come back from what he knew to be his master's lips, and then the unmistakable snapping sound of flint and steel.

A second later there was a star of light which suddenly leapt into a flame as some kind of a torch was suddenly kindled, and then all three fugitives looked around them in an amazement that was mingled with admiration, for they were in the centre of a vast hall whose walls and even ceilings were covered with paintings, both of animate and inanimte nature, with the color as bright as if they had been laid on yesterday, yet which Frank Donelly and Nellie Trezarr, at all events, knew must have been antique works of art even in those to us ancient days when the Red Sea waves parted to permit of the goming of the Israelites and rushed together again for the drowning of Pharaoh and his host.

This was not a time, however, for the studying of ancient art, for the Bedouins, did they but imagine that they had taken refuge there, might enter the tomb in turn and bestow on them the honor of making it their own.

Frank Donelly therefore sternly bade their guide lead on, not before, however, he had remarked that this was the recluse's usual abode, for there were sufficient evidences of the fact in the few necessaries that it contained, consisting of a mat, a pitcher and a wooden bowl, but even the ordinary Egyptian peasant has nothing more.

the mountains without ever seeing the daylight or the moonshine now. Yea, you shall so die and my lynx and jackal shall pick your bones, whilst your souls shall fizzle and fry forever and forever in the fiery pit of Borhut. You have cast dirt upon my beard and set my turban awry, you dogs, for is it not written that "he who lendeth succor to the oppressor or the unbeliever shall ere long strike his knees in vain?" Wherefore by every hair of the dogs that begot thee, Abou Seif the santon will take bitter vengeance for the indignities that ye have cast upon him."

And having thus spat out his venom, as it were, they could hear his rapidly receding footsteps, mingled with fresh peals of chuckling laughter.

"I wish I'd spitted the old baste on me spear, which sure an' I'd have done if it hadn't been for the winged devils, an' the darkness, an' the not thinking ov it until too late, at all at all," grunted Pat Monaghan.

"Just pass the spear over to me, Pat, to feel the way well in advance with, for I judge 'tis safer now to go on than to turn back, for that old rascal has gone to bring the Bedouins after us, and knowing all the ins and outs of this place we'd have no chance of overtaking him, even on horseback," said Frank Donelly.

"Lord presarve us from him and the likes of him," muttered Pat, as he passed the lance over Nellie's head, whom, as he took it, Frank comforted with the words:

"I feel sure that this passage will eventually lead to freedom, my darling, and the creatures that put out the lights and startled us so much were but bats. I saw them distinctly. Now that the accustomed darkness that they delight in has returned again they trouble us no longer, you see, so let us get on once more."

He waited for no reply, but urged on his horse as he spoke, feeling the way with the long lance so that the animal should not knock its head against anything or plunge headlong down into some hole or pit.

It was, in fact, that kind of darkness that writers say "may be felt," or "may be cut with a knife," and so on, so that it was anything but pleasant traveling when it was impossible to know what possible dangers might not be in the way.

More than once Nellie Trezarr felt convinced that she heard the pattering feet of the jackal and of the still more fearful lynx coming after them, whilst Pat Monaghan's fears were still chiefly of the supernatural, so that every instant he expected that Djin or giant devil would spring upon him and bear him away, where or for what purpose he did not even dare to conjecture.

But imagination was soon destined to give way to reality, for when they had proceeded in this slow and cautious manner for about ten minutes, the path appearing to trend gradually downward the while, they heard the unmistakable sound of other hoofs in their rear and coming on at a much faster pace than their own.

Then, far behind them, there suddenly flashed a glow of ruddy light, and looking round they beheld the hideous scorpion eater coming down the subterranean at a speed that was wonderful for his years, holding

Captain Donelly's and Pat Monaghan's revolvers, the rapid reports going rumbling and roaring into the innermost recesses of the vast subterraneans and awakening a score and more of echoes, which were quickly succeeded by those of the shrieks, howls, groans and execrations of the wounded and the dying as they fell clattering from their high demi-pique saddles to the resounding floor of the passage, whilst those who survived spurred forward over their writhing bodies with shriller cries still, intent on taking vengeance on the slaughterers of their brethren before they could reload.

But Captain Donelly and Pat Monaghan had six charges yet remaining in their revolvers, and now, stepping suddenly forward into view, they discharged them full in the faces and breasts of their swarthy foes, when so near that their tossing and straining horses' heads were almost within arm's length of their muzzles.

Each bullet found its billet on this occasion, and down went the shrieking Bedouins, one over the other, and amongst them the santon, with a hole in his throat, out through which the blood gushed like a fountain.

As he went crashing down his weight burst open the basket at his back, and the great flesh colored serpents, gliding forth, sprang upon the fallen men, and the plunging, rearing horses, hissing fiercely and burying their poison fangs in their prey.

As for the Bedouins who still remained mounted and apparently uninjured, and in number they were but three, they wheeled their horses round and galloped back into the darkness of the tomb, whilst giving utterance to loud cries of horror and dismay.

Ere they had disappeared altogether from view Captain Donelly and Pat were in their saddles and riding calmly forward to rejoin Nellie.

"Thanks to Pat's suggestion, we have got wholly rid of the rascals, for the three who still survive will let us depart in peace, I imagine," said Frank, and then he added, as a puzzled expression came over his fine countenance: "I wish that we knew how to recross the mountain, for we are now on the side of the great desert, which stretches for hundreds of leagues toward the very centre of Africa."

"No, Frank, it cannot be," replied Nellie, "for I feel certain that that is Cairo which I see over away yonder. And there, there are the Pyramids, too, and I feel equally sure that I can just make out a train steaming in that direction, the direction of the North Star, which must be Alexandria-ward, I take it."

"By all that's glorious, you are right, Nellie. Why, we must have come out on the same side of the mountain as that at which we entered. We have described the half of a half, or more likely of an oval, within the subterranean. I dared not have hoped for such good fortune. It saves no end of time."

"Be the saints, yer honor, an' it's a good down that we are into the bargain. It's just meself that knows this blessed plum tree, be the bit branch that I tore off in plucking some of the fruit, an' there it lies in the middle of the track to witness to the truth ov me words," observed Pat.

All was as clear now as the sun at noonday, and all that they seemingly had to do was to re-cross the desert till they struck the railway at the little village of Et-Tarraneh, where there was a station at which they would be able to take train for Alexandria, for the train, which they could still perceive, or to be more correct, the steam from her engine, was proof that the line between the capital and the great seaport had not yet been ripped up.

"After all, we may be aboard a British ship before dawn, darling," said Frank Dondences of the fact in the few necessaries that it contained, consisting of a mat, a pitcher and a wooden bowl, but even the ordinary Egyptian peasant has nothing more.

Holding the torch (which seemed to be composed of a bundle of sugarcanes bound tightly together and coated thick with a kind of gum) aloft in one hand, the santon strode on again, his beard still grasped by his captor, who could now watch the movements of the scorpions as they continued to wander all about his person, apparently at their own sweet will, and which, whenever one of them approached too near unto his hand, the young officer dislodged and sent clattering to the ground with the point of his sword. For well he knew that the sting of these hideous vermin is as fatal to a European as a serpant bite.

And now they enter the great painted hall, in the centre of which a vast tomb had evidently once stood, for a wide passage whose walls (where they were not painted) were covered with millions of hieroglyphics, somewhat like those which we see on Cleopatra's Needle and the Obelisk of Luxor, yet differing from them in many essential respects.

They had got down this high and wide passage very far, when they met a lynx and jackal walking quite amiably side by side, though the two animals are as a rule the most bitter enemies conceivable.

"If these are two of your infernal pets and you dare to set them on us your life shall pay the forfeit, remember," said Donelly, fiercely, and at the words the dull red glare that had come into the santon's eyes died out of them again, leaving them the same dull fishy gray as they had been before.

He spoke half a dozen words in shrill tones to the two beasts, at the same time wagging his left arm about with a gesture of menace; and evidently understanding him, their tails dropped and they slunk away into a narrow side passage, from whose pitch dark depths their eyes presently gleamed like live coals.

Nellie, whose heart had palpitated painfully at sight of the savage beasts, drew her breath more freely when they were gone, but one hour seemed to crowd fast upon the heels of another, for as they presently peered into a second and narrower passage a loud rushing noise greeted their ears, like a flapping of ghostly wings, so that Pat began to patter a Pater Noster, making sure that the Afrits, or Giant Devils, were upon them, while Nellie uttered a little scream, and even Frank became utterly disconcerted.

Had he noticed the sly and exultant expression of the scorpion eater he might have been better prepared for what was to come and how to avoid its consequences, for, lo, the uncanny noises rapidly increased in volume, the semi-darkness became all at once full of fluttering wings, hideous little horned heads, and shrill squeaks, and then all in an instant the torch was extinguished and the three fugitives felt themselves beat about their faces by quickly flapping, skinny leather substances, whilst an intolerable stench assailed their nostrils, so that it is little wonder that in the sudden darkness, terror and confusion Frank's hand for an instant relaxed the tightness of its grip on the santon's beard or that he, taking advantage of the opporunity, with a wrench and a bound released himself altogether therefrom, and laughing shrilly and exultantly, rushed away with the certainty that he would not again be caught.

In another minute they could hear him shouting in the distance:

"Yallah! Yallah! By the ninety-nine names of Allah and the hundred and fourteen chapters of the El Koran. By the fig and the olive and the soul of Khaled the blessed, you shall all die in the bowels of flashed a glow of ruddy light, and looking round they beheld the hideous scorpion eater coming down the subterranean at a speed that was wonderful for his years, holding aloft a torch in either hand and closely followed by a dozen or so of mounted Bedouins, whose bright lance points twinkled like stars above their scarlet shawl turbans.

"Lost, lost! We shall be sat upon and slain in this horrible subterranean," gasped Nellie, dropping her reins and clasping her hands together in an agony of terror.

"Bedad, but any how I'll kill some of them first, just for company, retorted Pat Monaghan cheerily, who looked upon the Bedouins (even with the scorpion eater thrown in) as a great improvement on Djins and giant devils.

Frank Donelly, however, had better words of consolation than Pat's, for he suddenly exclaimed:

"If there's a red light behind there's a white one ahead, Nellie, darling, and unless I'm greatly mistaken we will be out in the moonlight again before those fellows can come up with us."

CHAPTER XXX.

A COMBAT OF TWO TO TWELVE—AGAIN ON THE DESERT.

Frank Donelly's words proved prophetic ones, for every minute now the light became brighter in their front, enabling them to push forward every whit as rapidly as they were pursued, so that presently they squeezed their horses one by one through a narrow fissure that was hardly large enough to admit of their passage; indeed, Pat went so far as to declare that it was very like a "rich man struggling to get through the eye of a needle," he should think.

"An sure, yer Honor," he quickly added, "I don't see why we should let the spalpeens as are afther us come any further at all at all, for sure we might defend this narrow opening agin long odds from now till the crack of doom, if need be, like those old Greeks and Romans used to do we read of in the poethry and the story books."

"Another fine idea of yours, Pat; and by St. Patrick, your namesake, we'll put it in practice. Is your revolver charged in every chamber?"

"Aye, I've reloaded it since I settled the camels and the drumbledollies."

"Good; mine is in the same condition. We will dismount, sling our bridle over our arms, and take up our positions one on each side of the opening, sheltered by the rocks, and, by George we'll give those rascals pepper as they come up. Nellie, ride on a little way, my dear. We will overtake you presently."

"Oh, Frank, don't rush into any needless danger," pleaded the fair girl.

"No, darling; that we will leave our enemies to do. They come on unasked, and so they must take the consequences. Do as I ask you, Nellie."

She made no further opposition or observation, but rode on a little way and then drew rein.

Frank Donelly motioned to her, however, to move a trifle more to the right, fearing that she was somewhat in the Bedouin line of fire.

When she had obeyed his mute sign he gave all his attention to the latter gentry.

They were by this time near enough to require it, pounding along through the subterranean at the heels of the onward rushing santon under the full impression, no doubt, that instead of awaiting them just outside, the fugitives were hurrying down the mountain as fast as ever they could urge their horses.

They were soon undeceived on this point, however, for at the same instant "crack! crack! crack! crack! crack! crack!" went tween the capital and the great seaport had not yet been ripped up.

"After all, we may be aboard a British ship before dawn, darling," said Frank Donelly, "for I dare say they'll be running trains from Cairo as often as circumstances will allow during the night, so cheer up."

Nellie was quite willing to do so, for it's much pleasanter to encourage hope than despair in the heart. As for Pat, he didn't require any encouragement at all, as it was not his nature to look at the dark side of anything.

So they made they made their way down the steep mountain side with ease and circumspection, and directly that they had reached the desert plain steered straight across it as nearly as possible in the direction of Et Tarraneh.

If Captain Donelly really thought that all their dangers were over he calculated sadly without his host, for at least eighteen miles of desert lay between them and the railway station, towards which they were steering, and from all directions troops, regular and irregular, were concentrating towards the capital to swell the forces of the War Minister.

The fugitives proceeded slowly at first, for their horses wanted breathing space, but the once more fresh bracing air of the desert was not long in at all events partially restoring their strength and spirits when they progressed more rapidly, and then it was that Captain Donelly very shortly discovered that the desert in this direction was for the once not the desert at all.

For across it small bands of Bedouins seemed to be perpetually streaming, doubtless on their way to make up the sixty thousand irregular cavalry that Arabi Pasha had boasted he could have enrolled underneath his banner in less than a week, for well he knew that these mounted robbers would swarm like vultures to a feast, for quite as respectable as Turkish Bashi-Bazouks the Bedouin delights in slaughter and plunder quite as much as, according to Dr. Watts, dogs delight to bark and bite.

"Oh, if the moon were not quite so bright," thought the young officer to himself, for the grand luminary of night shed as clear and white a radiance over the sandy plain as a number of electric lights would diffuse over a boulevard or a street, and there were no shadows to take advantage of.

When Frank Donnelly had read of this desert ruse years previously he had never imagined that the time would come when he would be glad to avail himself of it himself.

It was quite effectual, however, for within the next hour they would certainly have been sighted and pursued had they been rash enough to have continued on their way; whilst owing to their precaution large parties of Bedouins passed quite near by without perceiving them.

Then, at last, the danger of discovery seemed to grow less and less, and their part of the desert to be getting empty again, so that they thought of once more remounting and continuing their journey, when, on suddenly looking round, Pat Monaghan beheld yet another party of Bedouins coming towards them, but following a course which betokened that they would pass much nearer by than any of the preceding bodies of the savage horsemen had done.

"Bedad, an' it's as straight as a bede line that the varmints are coming and if we would save our lives we'd better be up and away, yer honor."

"By Jove, I believe you're right, Pat. Up and away be it, then," rejoined his master, and the next instant he was undoing his horses leashings.

When they had seen to their own steeds and turned to perform the same office by Nellie's, lo, the deft and spirited girl had not only released the animal and got him on his legs, but had also mounted him and was quite ready for flight.

Before long, indeed, Donelly felt that they were like three poor fawns trying to cross a chessboard, with the rival knights, bishops, rooks and queen all bent on rendering the attempt a matter of shear impossibility.

As yet they were evidently unseen, but as he could hardly hope that they would continue so for long, he was presently fain to yield to the inevitable and adopt a ruse.

He called a halt, told Nellie that there was nothing much to be alarmed at, but that nevertheless it was better to be cautious, and then held a brief consulation with Pat Monaghan, the result of which was that all three dismounted, forced their horses to lie down, gagged them so that they could neither neigh nor whinny, tied their legs so that for them to rise was an equal impossibility, and then in the course of a very few minutes raised a circular barrier of sand high enough to conceal both their steeds and themselves as they crouched down.

Her prompt action had saved a couple of minutes at the least, and that brief space of time might be of the utmost value under the circumstances.

Frank gave her a word or two of ardent praise and flung himself into his own saddle even whilst speaking them, nor was Pat slow in imitating his example, and just as they were perceived and the Moslem war cry of "Allah ackbar! Allah, Allah! hu!" rent the air in their rear, accompanied by a great brandishing of scimitars and lances, the three fugitives were off at full speed again, Pat muttering something to the effect that "the devil might take the hindmost," yet for all that himself keeping in the rear, as he considered himself in duty bound to do, and answering the Bedouin defiance by twirling his own lance round and round above his head as though it were a shillelah, whilst he howled out a genuine Irish hullabaloo.

"Keep your breath to cool your porridge, Pat," exclaimed his master, somewhat annoyed. "This is no child's play, I would have you remember, so just postpone all vaporing until we are tearing along at the tail of the iron horse instead of on the backs of our own, my good fellow."

A communication from the Mayor of Buffalo made inquiry if a person calling himself Prof. C. A. Johnson, philanthroplst, professional astronomer, lecturer, literary and educational writer, editor, publisher and philosopher, was a member of the Lime Kiln Club. The Professor lately delivered a lecture in Buffalo, in which he sent forth the following utterances:

I am acknowledged to be the greatest scientific man of the age.

Wind is always in motion. It has a place where it is located when it is not at work.

I don't care a snap of my finger for other scientist's opinions. I am an authority in myself.

The wind is made of a material always in existence, and not as some people think, created for the moment.

There are twelve invisible suns which have shone in great brilliancy in the past and in ten years they will shine again.

The hiding place of the wind is in the interior of the ocean, 300,000 feet from the surface. If you want to ask questions about it you can; I have settled it.

There is more animal life in existence than a good many of us have been able to understand; the "nitroggen" and "hydroggen" gases extend higher than scientists have had time to look into.

I have found within a thimbleful of salt water more living insects than there have been human names created since the beginning of the world. If other men have not looked into this as I have, it's not my fault.

Scientific men tell me that wind is made of atoms of air force coming in contact with currents. If scientific men knew half as much about wind as I do, they would not make this mistake. When I saw their confusion I came to their rescue.

Wind is composed of volcanic gases and atmospheric matter located in the interior of space which is set in motion by astronomic force caused by the rotation of the sun, which coming in contact with counter-currents puts the wind in motion in places where it is hid.

I may be a modest man and I may not, but I don't believe there is a man in the City of Buffalo that knows as much about science as I do. If there had been, this subject would have been explained long ago. But it has been left for me to settle forever the question where the wind comes from.

The Secretary was instructed to reply to the effect that the Professor was neither a member of the club, nor did that body indorse his opinions.

RETURNED A BROKEN MAN.

Trustee Pullback then made a report on his trip to Washington, N. C., as a delegate from the club to attend an emancipation jubilee. He reached there all right after a journey lasting thirteen days, and was warmly welcomed by Archie Moore and J. P. Jones, of the Committee on Arrangements.

THE WORLD OVER.

A farmer in New Hampshire has been fined for cruelty in not providing shelter for his cattle during the late cold weather. He was the richest man in the neighborhood.

Nearly 80,000 acres of lands under water along the Connecticut shore have been sold by the State to oyster growers, and last year's taxes on this area (one-fifth of which is in use) yielded $8,000.

A milkman slipped and fell in New London the other day in such a way that he went head foremost into a can from which he had removed the cover, and, as it was a tight fit, a tinsmith's services were required to extricate him.

Mr. Parnell is a bachelor and lives the simplest sort of life—in lodgings, as a rule, taking his dinner at a hotel. His habits are so quiet that he and his sister Anna were guests at the same hotel for weeks without knowing that they were under one roof.

Few monarchs can boast of progeny so illustrious as King Christian IX. of Denmark. Five out of his six children are married and have families. The eldest sons of each of these families are the prospective monarchs of Denmark, Greece, the British empire, Russia, and Hanover.

According to the British Medical Journal the most flagrant dietetic errors on the part of poor people arise from ignorance of the nutritive value of foods. When they cannot buy meats, whose importance they recognize, they do not put proper articles in the place of it. They do not correctly estimate the high value of milk and eggs; and when obliged to use a largely vegetable diet they make no distinction between unnutritious vegetables and those which, like peas and beans, are rich in nitrogen and well calculated to supply the place of animal food.

Nearly three years have elapsed since Gambetta's remains were consigned to the grave at Nice, but nothing has yet been done to give even a decent appearance to his last resting place. An old friend of the departed statesman, who visited the cemetery on the anniversary of his death in order to strew flowers on his tomb, gives a melancholy account of the state of neglect into which it has been allowed to fall. He says it is only a temporary scaffolding, a pyramid of wood covered with wreaths and offerings. The barrier which surrounds it is half rotten. The great tribune, apparently, is forgotten already.

A member of the Geological Survey says that Salt Lake will be of great value in the near future, not only on account of the common salt it will produce, but also for the sodium sulphate it contains. The latter is separated in a flocculent precipitate by the cold weather of wid winter, and annually thrown up on the shore in enormous quantities. There are many other lakes in the far West whence an inexhaustible supply of commercial alkalies may be obtained at small cost. Mono Lake, Cal., alone being estimated to hold over 78,000,000 tons of sodium carbonate.

The peasant Indians of Central America hold some curious superstitions, of which the following are examples: When a child is ill the mother takes a drake, singes its tail feathers, and, muttering certain words, passes it over the patient. A woman feeds a parrot with a few pieces of tortilla and gives the child the crumbs which fall from the beak, as they will make it talk! Colic is due to the evil eye; in order to get rid of the disturbing influence the woman breaks four duck's eggs into a basin, and, having mixed them with rue, places the whole under the child's bed; if the compound be curdled in the morning the spirit says he always drops such letters in the waste basket, but that when he goes to dinner the elevator boy amuses himself by filling out the blank cards and placing them in the return envelopes addressed "Joel Chandler Harris, Atlanta, Ga."

"Diamond Joe" Reynolds is one of the millionaire curiosities of Chicago. He invariably wears a plain grey suit without an overcoat, a hat several seasons behind, prunella gaiters that have been out of style for years, and always has in his shirt front a first water diamond as large as a filbert and as bright as a dewdrop. He owns more grain elevators than any man in the country and ships more grain than any two men on the Chicago Board of Trade.

It is pretty clear now that General Prendergast made no arrangement for maintaining order at Mandalay after the surrender of Thebaw, that a saguinary riot occurred, that the mob had possession of the town all night, that statements to this effect were calmly disbelieved by the British commander three miles off, and that the Times correspondent was sent back to Rangoon simply because he had telegraphed home a description of this discreditable bungling. Yet it may be taken for granted that Gen. Prendergast will not be repremanded, and that correspondent will be frowned upon by the whole of officialdom, both in India and Pall Mall

George Tiptos was a farmer in Madison county, Kentucky, about twenty years ago. He became financially involved and went to the West Indies. He secured control of a small island of the Bahama group which proved to be rich in phosphates, from which he amassed great wealth. He ruled autocratically, and no women or intoxicating liquors were permitted upon the island. The ruler of this Eveless and prohibited Eden is now on a visit to his native State, and is expected to take back with him a Blue Grass widow and a full supply of Kentucky bourbon.

At the informal opening of Parliament when the Queen was not present in the House of Lords amongst the members of the House of Commons who assembled on the floor of the throne was Sir William Harcourt, who took the liberty of resting his arm upon the railing in front of the royal seat. For this offence—for it is an offence, it seems, when the throne is uncovered—he was promptly reproved by an official, who with equal promptitude was reported by the right hon. gentleman to the yeoman usher. Sad to say, the ex-home secretary was ruled to have been out of order; for when the throne is denuded of its brown holland covering, the Queen is supposed to be present in spirit, if not in person, and that being the case the royal railings must not be leant upon—not even by such a descendant of royalty as Sir William Harcourt.

According to the Jewish Chronicle, Baron Alphonse de Rothschild is not the first Hebrew who has been admitted into the French Academy of Fine Arts. The late Achille Fould, the celebrated finance minister to Napoleon III., was elected a free member of the Academy in 1854. The illustrious composer, Halevy, also had a seat in the body as a titular member. The election of Baron Rothschild raises the number of Jewish members of the Institute of France to eight, his colleagues being MM. Breal, Joseph Derenbourg, Henri Weil, and Oppert of the Academy of Inscriptions and Belles Lettres; Adolph Franck, whose election dates back to 1844, of the Academy of Moral and Political Sciences; Loewy and Maurice Levy of the Academy of Sciences. The most famous section of the institute, viz., the Academy Francaise, is the only one which has not yet given a fauteuil to a Jew.

jubilee. He reached there all right after a journey lasting thirteen days, and was warmly welcomed by Archie Moore and J. P. Jones, of the Committee on Arrangements. During the first two hours of his stay some one stole his watch, and later on his satchel and pocketbook were missing. His complaints were treated with supreme indifference, and on the day of the jubilee he was set upon and pounded until he could hardly walk. He had his credentials all straight, and no one disputed them, but he thinks there was a conspiracy to do him up because the Lime-Kiln Club had refused to grant a charter to the "Koon-Killin' Klub" of Washington so act as a branch. Trustee reached home after enduring hardships which would have killed a United States Senator, and has been in bed nearly ever since.

HEROIC MEASURES.

When his verbal report had been submitted there was a murmur of indignation throughout the hall, and Waydown Beboe offered the following resolution:

"Resolved, Dat until de Gub'ner of North Carolina forwards us an apology in writin', accompanied by a check of at least $75 to recompense Brother Pullback fur his sufferins, all intercourse between dis club an' de said State of North Carolina must be considered at end."

The resolution was unanimously adopted.

AN IMPOSTOR.

A communication from St. Louis made inquiry if a person named Gen. Syntax Cobalt was a member of the Lime-Kiln Club. He was in jail in that city for soliciting donations to colored orphan asylums and salting the cash down in his vest pocket. He claimed to be a member of the club in good standing, but had no documents.

The Secretary was instructed to telegraph the St. Louis police to proceed against the man in the most vigorous manner, as he has on several occasions falsely claimed to be a member and thereby impossd on the people at large.

Curl Papers and Crimping Pins.

I want to add my protest against curl papers and crimping pins. In the place where I live more than half the women and girls go about with their foreheads thus adorned all the morning, and often the whole day. Besides being very uncomplimentary to the family, callers are liable to drop in at any time. Not long ago I made a call at 7 o'clock in the evening and found the two daughters of the family with foreheads covered with curl-papers. I cannot see any excuse for it.

But there is one thing worse. Some of my neighbors just twist up their hair in the morning, without brushing or combing it, nor do they stop to put on a white collar. I don't see how such women can think much of their husbands if they are willing to sit down to breakfast looking so frowsy. By getting up a little earlier the hair can be neatly arranged and there will be time to relieve the bareness of the neck with a white collar or ruffle. A woman ought to be just as neatly dressed for the kitchen as for the parlor, for her own family as for company.

I have been disgusted to see in many kitchens a brush and comb by the looking-glass, indicating that some member of the family brushed their hair there. I even once saw two switches of false hair lying on the shelf. What could be worse? Brush your hair in any other room in the house say I, but never do it in the kitchen. What say the rest of you?

breaks four duck's eggs into a basin, and, having mixed them with rue, places the whole under the child's bed; if the compound be curdled in the morning the spirit has departed.

Do Animals Think?

A great deal has been written to show that animals think and reason, just as man does, though in a lower degree. Perhaps some of our readers may notice things in animals which show that they have a great deal of intelligence, even if they do not reason. Mr. Paul Brocca, the French author, devoted much attention to this subject. It has been said of animals, writes Mr Brocca, that their actions are always mechanical and without method. This may be true of domestic pets, who are influenced almost entirely by the human beings around them, but does not the beaver change his plans, acting now as builder, now as miner, according to circumstances? Besides this, every one knows that the bee frequently substitutes pentagonal, or five-sided, for hexagonal, or six-sided cells, and that this alteration in the work is made only when necessary. It has also been said that animals do not reason. What then is done by the foxes, which in Thrace, are driven on to the ice to test its strength? These animals step carefully and lightly, with their heads inclined, and turn back suddenly, directly they discover by the sound of the ice cracking that it is not safe to proceed farther. A dog, which, in following a scent, arrives at a cross-road is seen to stop, consider for a moment, then plunge along one of the roads, sniffling cautiously, turn back and try another road in the same manner, and finally dart unhesitatingly down the third. It is evident that his logic tells him that as his prey has not taken one of the first two roads examined, it must necessarily have taken the third road, so he does not waste time in further investigation. That this is not mere instinct is shown by the fact that a dog sometimes makes a mistake in such a case, and when the fact becomes evident he slinks out of sight of the hunters, looking a picture of shame and humiliation.

Foresight is a quality the possesssion of which no one will deny to ants and bees, and the former certainly have a sense of compassion. This is displayed in the tender care bestowed on the wounded during the terrible battles fought between different tribes of ants. The suffering and helpless ones are not left to perish, but are carried off of the battlefield by a regular "ambulance corps." No one doubts the existence of memory in animals, and as to ambition, is it necessary to recount the pitched battles which take place in bee-hives between the different candidates for royalty? How can one pretend that man only has the gift of language! He must be blind indeed who does not see that all animals have some means of communication with each other. To give any one example: there is no possible doubt that ants make themselves understood by their fellows by means of the touch of their delicate, sensitive antennæ or feelers. Before a war a council is held, and messengers hurry about. Scouts or spies are sent out, and the attack is hastened or postponed, according to their reports. All this could not be done without a very complete method of communication, for the giving and receiving of orders, etc. Moreover, if animals had no language, how could they teach their young? That they do teach them is evident from the fact of young foxes in countries where the animals are hunted, being infinitely more wary than full-grown ones in other lands! How else are we to account for this than by saying that the parent foxes tell the children of danger, and to avoid it?

WHY I KILLED HIM.

AN ASYLUM STORY.

BY LILY CURRY.

My head had ached and ached all that morning; beginning before daybreak, the pain gradually altered from an occasional twinge or start to a dull steady throbbing, which could in no way be cured or lessened. I had hardly slept an hour throughout the night; the troubled slumber into which I had dropped at moments had been fraught with horrible scenes and shadows that bore down upon me with stifling pressure. I awakened frequently to toss the coverings away and rise from the bed in the dim light of my quiet room, and each time I would pass hastily to the window of his apartment opposite, where I knew he slept soundly and without fear. I often leaned out of my window into the still September night and listened, listened almost as if I would like to hear him breathing in his peaceful slumber. And when I had leaned and listened and waited until exhausted with my own intensity of feeling, I would return and throw myself again upon the bed and try vainly to find rest. That night! That night! The thought of it still hangs over me like some huge, terrible winged creature of the dark. Never shall I escape its cruel horrors! It was the end of all, and yet I knew it not. It was the last night of many similar nights through which he had slumbered peacefully and I had lain awake and suffered. The end of the torture to which he had subjected me was at hand, and yet I knew it not. Since that terrible day, months previous, when I had first found him false and since which I could place no absolute faith in his deeds and words, he had apparently striven to make amends. He had come to live nearer my own home; he had pleaded over and over again for pardon, had promised over and over that my confidence should never again be so abused. And in the months that needed elapse before our marriage he chose to dwell close to me—so that from his window he could see me at my own, at work or resting, so that I might wave my hand to him and know that he was smiling back.

Just now, in the silence of this place, and with my eyes closed, I could see his face again, framed in the half opened heavy green shutters of his windows; I could hear him whistling a snatch of blithe melody, across the narrow street.

Sometimes my eyes feel as if they were on fire. And yet how long ago it happened! But sometimes even now, when I am sitting here alone, it seems to be all happening over again, and I find myself wandering again the streets of the city, treading the smooth stones of the pavement, as if to tread out my own former footprints left there in hours of bitterest agony. At such times I re-live the whole of that terrible year. Every hour, every moment repeats itself with unaltering fidelity I remember how he looked; how long he had been my lover; how ardent his love and devotion had seemed; how he had sought and pursued me; how at length I had been moved to care for him and had promised to wed him. I remember the certain obstacles which delayed our marriage, and how I had chafed at the delay. I remember how I had found him out, and how I had left him, and how he had followed me, and how I had forgiven him. I remember how I had found him out again his love and devotion had seemed; now he had sought and pursued me; how at length I had been moved to care for him and had promised to wed him. I remember the certain obstacles which delayed our marriage; the friends who warned me against him; the scorn with which I repelled all who might seek to warn me against him. I remember the sacrifices I made for him. I remember my discovery of his first falsity, and the agony I suffered thereat. After that the old confidence, the old trust seemed to vanish, and life to become a dreadful uncertainty of hopes and fears. All the more sorry was my plight, since I had sacrificed friends and acquaintances because of my lover, rejecting all their hints and admonitions until they turned from me in anger and disgust. All alone was I; all alone, and waiting patiently for the days to pass, and working diligently when and as I could, though secretly disturbed at moments by little things that he might do or say, and other little incidents of which he was unaware.

One was the finding of a letter once after he had gone away, upon the floor, beside the chair on which he sat; a letter from another woman, though whether or no to him I loved I could not tell. No signature but one initial letter curled snake-shaped at the end; no beginning but "My darling." No date so that I could tell nothing, nothing, nothing! I could only fear. It was on the day before this terrible last night, that I had found this letter. In the evening when he had come across to call upon me, I spoke to him of it, questioned him and frankly told him my thoughts. He laughed and kissed me. I know not why, but instinctively I thought of the kiss of Judas, and wondered if that earliest traitor had not laughed, and if his laugh had not sounded like that just at my ear. "A silly girl," my lover had said.

As I said before, my head was aching wretchedly that morning, and I could barely force a smile when the heavy shutters across the way were thrust wide open and his face looked out.

I watched for him to leave the house. He remained a long time in his room, moving about busily, putting things here and there. I wondered why.

When at length I saw him come out into the street, he walked very rapidly and did not once look up to lift his hat and smile.

My head ached dully as I went about my work.

It was mid-afternoon when, seated at my window, watching his window to know when he should have returned, I fell into a dreamless, exhausted doze, from which I shortly aroused at a clicking sound from across. He had come home, for one of the shutters, which had both been open, was closed, and some one moved behind it. I looked eagerly for some sign, and saw that he was rocking to and fro in his rocking-chair behind the shutter which was closed, and at each motion just passing it a little so that I could catch a narrow glimpse of chair back and his head above. I waited and waited. And still he rocked to and fro. And still he never turned to look upon me. I could not understand why he should not turn. I leaned forward and whistled a snatch of tune we both knew and loved. I waved my hand—it seemed to me he must have seen and known. And still he rocked!

Then, suddenly, a terrible thought

So at the single pistol shot he fell down dead; so my duty was done. As of other vermin, the world was well rid of him. And she who waited might wait forever for his voice. He would lie no more; he would harm none other. He was dead, and at my hands.

. . . . . .

Yet here in the grayness and the silence of my retreat, I sometimes remember his easy grace, his careless face, his blithe gait as he came to meet his death, and at such times I like to write it all down, my reason—my reason why I killed him!

Self-Praise.

Conceit is an insufferable quality in a man or woman, an honest self-estimation is quite another thing. A man must, however, have indisputably proved by his deeds that he is worthy to stand among the great, before an assumption of worth can be forgiven him.

Some of the self-laudatory remarks of famous men have an honest simplicity, which amuses us, while we are unable to dispute their substantial truth.

Victor Hugo set a high valuation upon his own genius. It is said that, in speaking of a continued existence after death, he declared that only in a future life should he attain the true greatness which his earthly career merely promised.

"At present," said he, "I am but the tadpole of an archangel."

Although this metaphorical natural (or celestial) history may have struck his hearers as being slightly irreverent, it evidently expressed his honest opinion of his own great powers.

John Hunter, a wonderful anatomist and surgeon of the eighteenth century, had no delicate scruples against laudation of his own talents.

"Ah, John Hunter, still hard at work!" one day exclaimed a medical friend, who found him at the dissecting-table.

"Yes, doctor," was the reply, "and you'll find it difficult to meet with another John Hunter when I am gone!"

Again he is reported as saying, "I know I am but a pigmy in knowledge, but I feel as a giant when compared with other men.

Self-praise is not confined to individuals; often it embraces an entire nationality.

"How do you like the English?" asked a British squire of his Scotch gardener.

"Weel, sir," was the answer, "bein' frae hame, and among the English, I find nae great faut in them; but I maun mak' this remark, that for mee-nisters or gardeners, or anything needing hede-wark, ye maun come to us i' the north!"

Such remarks are merely amusing, because we are occasionally willing to bear them from a great man, and from a small man they are palpably absurd. Remembering, however, that Socrates earned his right to be called the wisest of men by his recognition of his own ignorance, and that Sir Isaac Newton declared himself to be a child, picking up a few pebbles of knowledge, while the great ocean of truth lay all undiscovered before him, it will perhaps be safest for the great majority of us to preserve a discreet silence in regard to our powers.

In a medical report to the Maritime Customs of China, Dr. A. Henry refers to the astonishing prevalence of suicide at Ichang. One day a young girl broke a basin, and, being scolded, went into an adjoining room and hanged herself. On the same day a man committed suicide in the same way after an altercation with his father. For a similar cause a young man attempted on the following day to cut his throat. The writer says that suicide is a veritable ma[illegible] lady.

of the sled. The top of the toboggan is just like the bottom. It is somewhat thicker than a sheet of writing paper and about as long as an after-dinner speech. Its seating capacity is limited only by the number of people who can get on it. The urbane and gentlemanly conductor sits aft and uses one of his lithe and willowy legs for a steering apparatus by which he guides the toboggan some way or other. It is easy to slide down hill on a toboggan. In fact, after you start down you can't do anything else. True, you could fall off. That is easily done. The flying machine is not high, so you havn't evry far to fall. Still, if you have to fall from a toboggan half way down the slide, or else fall down stairs with a kitchen stove, you take the stove and the stairs everytime. It isn't so exciting and its so soon. The prince and I walked up the stairway for the purpose of sliding down the banister on a toboggan. The president of the club took his place aft; somebody said "let her go." Then we stopped, and the president said "How did we like it?" I left my breath at the top of the slide and we had to go up and get it. There it was, a great gasp 3½ inches long, sticking in the air like an icicle, just where I had gasped it when we started. I took it down, stuck it into my left lung and began to breathe again with great freedom. The toboggan is to any other way of getting down hill what flying is to going to sleep. If I was in a hurry and it was down hill all the way I would rather have a toboggan than a pair of wings any day.

P. S—There is usually an angel on the toboggan with you, which has a tendency to confirm the impression that you are going down with wings.

N.B—A young Canadian of broad experience assures me that Toronto angels really and truly have wings, insomuch that often he has to drive with one hand, using his other arm to hold the angel from flying away.

Addenda—I have known the same thing to happen in this United States.

CURLING.

We went to the Granite rink and watched the curlers. Curling is a game that will probably never become a general popular sport. The maddening excitement attendant upon this thrilling pastime, which seems to be its great fascination, debars any except the strongest heads and steadiest nerves from venturing into the seething maelstrom of its reckless gaiety. It is called curling because it makes your hair curl to watch it. A man takes a boulder of polished granite with a handle to it, and pushes it away from him. Then it slides along the ice. Two men with brooms walk along in front of it and sweep a clean place for it to slide in. Another man says, "Ay mon." He also remarks at intervals, "Soup her oop." A stranger once in a reckless hour joined a company of desperate curlers. In an unguarded moment he said "man" instead of "mon." The frenzied curlers at once tied a "stane" about his neck and chucked him through a hole in the ice.

But then, nonsense aside, everybody knows how knows anything at all, that a man must be to the manner born to appreciate and enjoy curling. A stranger intermeddleth not with the joy of the curler. The barbarian can never be taught to understand it and so his life must ever remain incomplete. And even an alien can see that it is more of a game than chess. I hold it to be solemn, self-evident, heaven-born truth, that a man who will play chess for amusement would saw a cord of wood for a joke.

A GREAT LEVELLER.

The snowshoe is to the Canadian lightsomeness, and to all the rest of the world a stumbling block. A man who has tried snow shoes for the first time is disqualified from writing about them for six months afterward. He might say something he would not only regret, but which he could not prove, and for which his Church would subject him to severest discipline. The best way for a beginner to wear snowshoes is to imitate the Indian who sells them. He carries them on his shoulder. I am now carrying mine in the baggage car. I will continue to carry them there until we reach the Custom-house. Then I don't know where the inspector will carry them. I don't want to pay duty on a pair of vile conspirators that have held me up to ridicule, thrown me down in the snow, torn my clothes and ruffled my temper. But I would like to get them home, I tried to slip them inside my trousers legs, but if you ever saw a snowshoe you will readily understand how, with the present style of pantaloons, that scheme would be a colossal failure.

Iceland in Summer.

Holiday makers who are at a loss where to go to insure a cool spot, may, perhaps, be tempted to try Iceland. It is not necessarily cool there, notwithshanding the refreshing sound of the name, but it is a good deal less likely to be hot than Swiss or even Scotch valleys, and there is a good deal more to see that would be fresh to the visitor. Nor is the island by any means difficult to get at.

The Danish Royal Mail steamers make a monthly voyage from Copenhagen to Reykjavik, and five of them run all round the island, as well as calling on each voyage at Leith. There is also an English line during the summer from Leith to Reykjavik.

Iceland is by no means the diminutive country which people who do not look at large maps are in danger of supposing it to be, when they read that the population does not exceed that of a third-rate English town. It is possible to travel from east to west in a direct line for a greater distance than from London to Carlisle, so that the island is really of very respectable dimensions.

Nor are the people, remote as is their dwelling-place from the centres of sweetness and light, by any means an uncultured race. They have had a Parliament of their own—the Althing—for now nearly a thousand years, and they are a great deal better instructed than European populations generally

The ordinary cockney tourist would hardly find himself at home among them; but an intelligent observer, interested in the study of nature and in the ways of isolated communities, might really do much worse during the summer months than brace himself up for the winter by a week or two in Iceland.

Fishing and farming are the Icelander's principal pursuits, and fishing is more important, perhaps, than farming. There are practically no manufacturers in the country, and trade is so little developed that up to last year the island did not even possess a bank, though the Althing was seriously occupying itself with the establishment of such an institution. Some interesting information on the Icelandic fisheries is contained in the last report presented to the Foreign Office by Mr. Consul Paterson.

The Iceland fisherman's best customers are not his comparatively near neighbors—he has no neighbors at all but the Greenlanders, within six hundred miles—but the Spaniards. A good deal of the fish caught goes to Copenhagen, but more to Spain, and Spain gets the pick of the catches.

Wheat growing is no part of the Iceland farmer's industry. For that the climate is not warm enough. He breeds flocks and herds, and during his short summer is much concerned for the result of his hay harvest. These, last year, were not satisfactory in the southern parts of the island, owing to the occurrence of wet weather late in the Champagne is now the fashionable wine in England.

New Zealand, with a population of about 600,000, has a debt of nearly £31,000,000, or over $250 to each inhabitant.

African travellers agree that elephant steaks are very tough. It takes half an hour to eat a square inch of elephant meat.

At a race in South Australia a few weeks ago, the falling of a leading horse brought nearly the whole field tumbling over him. Two jockeys were killed outright, half a dozen others seriously (some fatally) injured, and several horses killed or maimed.

The London Times lately contained an advertisement for a smart-looking second footman, who must have unexceptionable character and be active, an early riser, and speak French and English. The inducements held out to this paragon are $80 a year.

A woman in Bohemia was lately sentenced to imprisonment for ten days for forgery because she changed her physician's prescription calling for 1.20 gramme of morphine so that it read 6.20 grammes. It is said that no simllar case has ever apepared on the court records of the United States or England.

Lady Granville Gordon, whose new departure as a hat and bonnet maker in London has excited attention, is the daughter of Mr. Roe, the Dublin distiller, who has fallen on evil days. Hence the bonnet shop, as Lord Gordon has not, nor ever had, any money. His grandfather, the Marquis of Huntley, was sold out by the Sheriff, and his brother, the present Marquis, had writs out against him for obtaining money under false pretenses, but his brother-in-law came to his aid at the eleventh hour, and the proceedings were withdrawn.

The "Claimant" has just delivered a lecture in Dublin. He drew an immense audience, who hailed him as he came on with cries of "Hallo, Roger!" and "Wagga-Wagga!" All the other performers with him were hissed off. Sir Roger was in evening dress, and is described as tall of stature, portly in build, of dark complexion, and as solemn as a professional undertaker in appearance. His powers of oratory are not good, his voice is bad, and his twenty minutes' address was of the plainest character.

The railway cars of Russia, says a writer in Mechanics, are among the most commodious in the world. They resemble ours rather than the compartment cars in use elsewhere on the continent of Europe, but in Russia the aisle is shifted to one side, so that the seats on the left will accomodate three passengers side by side and those on the right but one. This is especially convenient when the car is not crowded in night travel. The end doors of the car, instead of opening upon the platform, lead into a small, enclosed vestibule, whence doors open out at right and left.

At the Royal Academy exhibition in London, which gives a fair idea of the architectural taste of the time, it will be found that the plain early English style so popular with architects for many years past in the designs for churches, is giving way to later styles, especially the flamboyant decorated. A curious example of this new departure is shown in the subjects chosen for study by the art students in the Architectural Museum, Westminster. A few years since scarcely any subjects were selected for drawing or modelling but the beautiful foliages of the thirteenth century, whereas now

SNOW IN THE STREETS.

How it is Removed in Lond n at a Very Moderate Expense.

The question, what is the best way of disposing of snow in the city streets? is much discussed, says the New York World. One man suggests that the city should appoint officials to stand along the docks and buy all the snow that may be offered at a certain price per cartload, pay for it on the spot, and see it dumped into the river. The wise inventor of this method thinks that since almost all the carts and wagons are idle during the prevalence of snow there would be a universal turnout of the unemployed class, and the whole island would be cleared of snow in two days.

In London the snow is emptied in pits excavated for the purpose, with perforated iron bottoms, under which there is a coil of pipes heated by steam. In these pits the snow is rapidly melted, and the water runs away into the sewers. In this manner the snow from the business parts of the city is rapidly removed at a very moderate expense.

In Milan the removal of the snow is let out by contract at so much per inch. As soon as the snow ceases falling the city engineer, in the presence of certain officials and the chief contractors, measures the depth of snow on stone slabs which are completely sheltered from the winds. This measurement furnishes the basis for computing the price which the city is to pay for each ward and district. There are portions of the city which present peculiar difficulties, and for cleansing these the contractors get a larger allowance.

On a winter's day in Milan, after a fall of snow, there will be as many sometimes as three thousand men in the streets sweeping and shoveling.

The remarkable circumstance is the small sum of money which it costs Milan to get entirely rid of its snow. In the winter of 1874-5 the total fall of snow amounted to a little over three feet six inches. The expense of its removal was about $12,000. The winter before last the fall was only five and a quarter inches, which was removed for $5,200. The city, we should add, furnishes all the implements employed except vehicles and horses. Generally speaking, it costs to remove the snow from the streets of Milan about $1,000 an inch.

One thing is certain: The snow should be removed from our cities within forty-eight hours after it has fallen. It is the worst possible economy to let it remain to thaw and freeze and freeze and thaw from November to April.

not warm enough. He breeds flocks and herds, and during his short summer is much concerned for the result of his hay harvest. These, last year, were not satisfactory in the southern parts of the island, owing to the occurrence of wet weather late in the summer. A further reduction of live stock was the consequence of the scarcity of fodder. In the north, however, the hay crop was good, and the farming interest there is fairly prosperous.

"Canna Thole."

If a Hindoo has a daughter who remains "an unappropriated blessing" at the age of ten years, he considers himself disgraced. From the day of her birth he is anxious to secure her a husband As a portionless girl is not attractive to men, the father saves a little every year, so that his daughter's dowry may increase her value in the matrimonial market.

The young lady is not consulted. The bridegroom may be old and repulsive, but she accepts him as the husband to whom her father has sold her. Even if he is young and comely, her interest in him is far less than that with which she surveys the jewels that adorn her person. The wedding ceremonies and feasts which celebrate her sale and delivery to a master, are far more attractive to her childish nature than is her husband.

When she is transferred, as if she were a heartless and soulless animal, to her lord's house, she begins a dull, dreary life, relieved only by the cares of the kitchen, the nursery, and the idols, and broken by the scoldings of her mother-in-law.

Scholars tell us that not a few of the customs of modern civilization originated in India. Perhaps they would assert that the cultured European marries off his daughter to-day as the uncultured Hindoo has done for hundreds of years. Certainly, the following anecdote, if it is illustrative of a general practice, endorses his assertion.

A Scotch farmer's wife was one day explaining to a neighbor how well she had married her daughter, who had a new house filled with new furniture, and many acres, on which cows, sheep, pigs and poultry fed, to say nothing of a gig, in which to drive to market, "jist like a leddy."

The neighbor expressed her delight at such a grand marriage. "Oh, there's nae doubt it's a grand marriage," answered the mother, "an' it wasna jist for ae thing."

"An' what might the ae thing be?" asked the now curious neighbor.

"Weel, ye see," answered the mother, as if tho "ae thing" was of little consequence, "the puir silly cratur canna thole [endure] her man

Hudson Bay Railway.

Mr Hugh Sutherland is in Winnipeg conferring with the contractors for the proposed Hudson Bay road. On being interviewed he said:— "I hope to be able to announce very shortly that all arrangements are complete for the building of the railway, and I believe that in less than two years a train will run from Winnipeg to Hudson Bay. I do not wish it, however, to be understood that all difficulties have been overcome, although I do say that everything looks most promising. It is no easy task to raise $15,000,000, for that is the least it will take." He also submits a report of the Company's officer with the Alert, expressing the opinion that navigation will be open from April or May till November.

Paper rails are made in Russia. They are longer than ordinary rails, and said to have a greater adhesiveness in contact with the art students in the Architectural Museum, Westminster. A few years since scarcely any subjects were selected for drawing or modelling but the beautiful foliages of the thirteenth century, whereas now perpendicular details are preferred almost to the exclusion of all others.

A scientific journal gives an account of a pianoforte made in Paris in which paper was made to take the place of wood, the whole case being made from paper so compressed that it was enablod to receive a hard surface, which took a perfect polish. The color was cream white. The tone of the instrument is reported to be not loud, but very sweet. The short, broken character of the sound emitted by ordinary pianofortes is replaced by a soft, full, quasi-continuous sound, resembling somewhat that of the organ. It has been suggested that the evenness of texture of the compressed paper may have some influence in effecting this modification of sound.

It is surprising how many British statesmen of note have once at least completely changed their political views. Lord Castlereagh began as a burning Nationalist, and drank, in 1790, at a dinner to the Northern Whig Club, "to the Revolution!" It will not surprise any one if, too, in another decade, his great nephew, Lord Randolph Churchill, should veer round. Again, the late Lord Derby mainly carried, as Whig and reformer, the measure reducing the preposterous number of Irish Protestant prelates. His own son's change of views and that of the late Sir R. Peel are notorious, as is the fact that Lord Beaconsfield was not always an ardent Tory, or Mr. Gladstone an advanced Liberal. Lord Russell never wavered. England cannot point to a more consistent career.

During a rehersal of the "Jota Aragonese" as arranged by Glinka at St Petersburg, recently, Dr. Hans von Bulow stopped the clarionet player in the middle of a phrase, and said: "You have made a mistake; play F natural instead of F sharp." The player remarked that the passage had been so played ever since the piece was written. "Never mind that," answered Von Bulow; "I don't need a lesson in counterpoint." The incident caused much excitement in musical circles. The professors of the Conservatoire protested against their chief composer being corrected by Von Bulow, and the Grand Duke Constantine, honorary President of the Musical Society, sent his aide-de-camp to t the conductor that not a note of Glinak's music must be changed. Von Bulow did not, however, let the matter rest there. Before raising his baton to direct the piece at the public concert, he called out to the clarionet player "You will play F sharp, by order!"

"Good gracious," said the hen, when she discovered the porcelain egg in her nest, "I shall be a bricklayer yet."

It is thought the substance will be of great value for ointments.

Magnified Incidents.

The dwellers in lonely regions are forced to seize on the most trivial events and wring excitement from them, if they would find relief from the stagnations of their daily life. A traveller among the San Francisco mountains tells, in Outing, his own experience in finding a trivial circumstance dignified into matter for discussion. He says:

Once at Ash Forks, a collection of a dozen shanties, the ceatless ruffian who served a mockery of a dinner brought me a glass of milk. It had turned a little sour and no wonder; for in that desert place the sun beats down with a tropical heat.

Quite conscious of possible unpleasant consequences, I objected to my milk. The bearded waiter arms akimbo, stared defiantly, then slouched to the door, where sat the bulky landlord, and made known my complaint.

No less than four idlers followed that landlord to my table. The unfortunate glass of milk was passed in silence down the line. I felt the situation to be serious.

"Hanged if it ain't sour!" spoke at last the portly host, and every loafer echoed, "Hanged if it ain't!"

"Hanged if we don't make that ranchman drink the milk!" was the further verdict, supplemented by the chorus, "Hanged if we don't!"

"An' if he kicks, we'll hang him!"

"Shoot us ef we won't!"

That deranged milk was the event of the day for six men It furnished them with material for thought and speech.

Flea and Mosquito.

Fleas abound in southern Europe, an mosquitoes flourish in America. A Spanis or Italian lady would no more blush to be seen with a flea on her person than would an American girl to be bitten by a mosquito. But the American thinks that the presence of fleas indicates uncleanliness, and this fact lies at the bottom of the amusing anecdote told by tho Argonaut of San Francisco:

Some days ago a young lady was walking with a gentleman rather older than herself. Suddenly he saw upon her satin neck a black object. It moved—it was an insect—genus pulex.

Taking the advantage to which men with gray hair are so prone,—a younger man would have been more timid,—he at once removed the insect with his finger and thumb. The young lady turned at the touch inquiringly.

"Pardon me," said her companion, "but you had a flea on your neck."

The young lady showed mock displeasure.

"Should I not have removed it?" asked he anxiously.

"Ye-e-es," she replied, hesitatingly, "but you might have called it a mosquito."

—Sir John Macdonald will meet Parliament next Thnrsday with a deficit of FIVE MILLIONS. How about deficits now?

—Hyndman, Burns, Champion and Williams, the leaders of the Socialist rioters in London, are being prosecuted by the Government for their inflammatory speeches.

—Sir Richard Cartwright was in town yesterday. He leaves for Ottawa next week. He is in fine trim to fight "the Beasts at Ephesus," to use one of Sir John Macdonald's pet phrases.

—The Imperial Parliament re-opened yesterday, all the members of the new Government having been re-elected. Mr. Gladstone will make a detailed statement of his Irish policy in a few days. He has written a large number of letters to Irishmen of all classes asking their opinions on the Land question and Home Rule.

—Mr. John A. Barron of Lindsay has, we are pleased to note, been nominated by the Reformers of North Victoria to contest the riding for the House of Commons against Hector Cameron, M.P. Mr. Barron is a clever young man and would be a most desirable acquisition to the House. If any person can redeem the riding Mr. Barron can do it. We hope to see him elected.

TEACHERS ON TRIAL.

Grave Charges Against Messrs. Tinsdale and Aylsworth of Newburgh.

For some time there has been trouble brewing between the teachers of the High and Public Schools at Newburgh. Mr. David Hicks, B.A., the Principal of the High School, and Mr. Tinsdale, Headmaster of the Public School, could not agree on certain points and the result was the removal of Mr. Hicks by the Board. A great many of the residents of the village were much annoyed at this proceeding, as Mr. Hicks was a man of high character and had done excellent work in the school. Feeling that an injury was done him at the instigation of Tinsdale, Mr. Hicks preferred charges of drunkenness, gambling and profane language against him, and other charges against Mr. Aylsworth, teacher in the High School, and a petition signed by thirty residents was forwarded to the Minister of Education asking for an investigation by the Department, and it was granted. In accordance with this decision, Dr. Hodgins, Deputy Minister of Education, opened the investigation in the Town Hall, Newburgh, on Tuesday at 3 o'clock.

The first case taken up was that of Mr. Tinsdale, charged with drunkenness, gambling and using profane language. Mr. D. H. Preston of Napanee appeared for the prosecution; and County Crown Attorney Morden and Mr. Bolster of Tamworth for the defence. The first witness called was Mrs. Aikens, with whom Tinsdale boarded. She knew nothing wrong in his habits. Mr. Libby, of Napanee High School staff, was next called, and he very reluctantly, not wishing, as he said, to appear as an informer, acknowledged to having seen Mr. Tinsdale drinking at the bar in Hope's hotel, Newburgh, on the night of the Presbyterian concert, Dec 11th last, and heard him use profane language in conversation. Henry Paul swore that he had seen Tinsdale drink on several occasions; also saw him gambling for money at a pic-nic down the river and at Sharbot Lake. Fred. Shibley testified that he had seen Tinsdale drink but could not say that he was drunk. The court then adjourned till 9.30 Wednesday morning.

On resuming Wednesday, Wm. Bell was called and testified that he had seen defendant gambling and had also seen him drink but did not remember having ever heard him use profane language. Geo. Fox acknowledged to having been drunk with Tinsdale in the upper hotel, Newburgh. He said both of them were full. Mr. Angus Martyn, Principal of Bath High School, had known Mr. Tinsdale for 9 years and never knew him to be drunk, or gamble, or use profane language. Tinsdale was troubled with asthma and used liquor for his ailment. The evidence of Messrs. James Murphy, Joseph Davey and D. Burdette was not important, Mr. Murphy's only corroborating that of others previously given. Mrs. Black, with whom Mr. Tinsdale had boarded, testified that he was a quiet inoffensive man and knew of nothing wrong in his habits. This closed the evidence for the prosecution. For the defence Mr. John D. Ham, chairman of the Board of Education, was called. He had heard of no complaints against Mr. Tinsdale until these charges were laid. Had never seen him the worse of liquor or known of his gambling or using profane language. Mr. D. Hicks, the prosecutor, was also called and swore that he had no personal knowledge of the truthfulness of the charges. All he knew of Mr. Tinsdale's alleged misconduct was what people had told him. This closed the case. The counsel then addressed the court, Mr. Morden arguing

L. & A. TEACHERS' ASSOCIATION.

The Annual Meeting.

The annual meeting of Lennox and Addington Teachers' Association opened in the Model School building yesterday at 10 a.m. The roll being called forty-eight teachers responded, which number was largely increased during the session. The storm of Wednesday no doubt contributed to the smallness of the attendance as compared with former occasions. The minutes of former meeting were read and adopted. Mr. Burrows, I.P.S., read a circular from the Minister of Education relative to the establishment of teachers' reading circles, and the benefits to be derived therefrom. Appended he gave a long list of works recommended to be read.

Moved by J. M. Lyman, seconded by W. H. Rose, that Mr. Burrows, I. P. S., with such others as he might choose to associate with himself be a committee to consider the subject and report to the convention.—Carried. Mr. Burrows named Messrs. Martyn, Lyman, Lennox, Rose and Miss Vrooman to act with himself as such committee.

The subject of promotion examinations was then introduced by Inspector Burrows, who suggested the advisability of a committee being appointed to report on the subject.

Moved by W. H. Rose, seconded by F. Sanderson, that a committee be appointed to consider the amount of third book work and Arithmetic to be done for promotion.

Mr. Bowerman suggested that it would not be wise to divide the third book literature work.

Messrs. Lyman, Sanderson, Rice, Lennox and Black spoke on the advisability of the work for third class being carried on further than the programme calls for, especially in arithmetic. By a vote of the teachers it was resolved to carry on the arithmetic through vulgar fractions; the third class literature to embrace the first half of the third book for the next examination and the whole book for subsequent promotions. In the subject of Drawing, Book No. 1 of the drawing series will be taken for the next examination.

It was resolved that the present system of grouping schools for the promotion examination be adhered to; and that in case any teacher has no pupils for promotion, he shall nevertheless be present and constitute one of the board of examiners for his group.

The roll was again called that those not present in the morning might have an opportunity of answering to their names. The meeting then adjourned till 5 p. m.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The afternoon session opened at 2 p. m. pursuant to adjournment. One hundred and twenty teachers responded to the roll call.

Dr. Baptie, of Ottawa, was then introduced and proceeded to give an exposition of the subject, "The Kitchen as a Chemical Laboratory." The Doctor illustrated his remarks by some simple experiments which were duly appreciated by all present. He made use of articles in common use in the kitchen, such as soda, cream of tartar, vinegar, etc., and showed how children might be entertained by experiments which could be performed by means within the easy reach of any teacher.

Dr. Hodgins, Deputy Minister of Education, was then introduced and spoke at some length in regard to the position occupied by Canada as compared with other countries, instancing the more marked progress of some of the Western States in educational matters than was the case in Canada or in the older Eastern States. He showed the urgent necessity of fostering the introduction of industrial drawing into our schools, dwelling at some length on the more marked progress which England and France

Thursday. It is said there will be no allusion made to the Riel matter in the Speech from the Throne. If this should prove true the omission will furnish conclusive proof that the Riel discussion was forced on the Ontario Legislature by the Tories merely to make political capital. The session will, it is expected, be a lively one in any event.

—The Crawford Dilke scandal has been disposed of by the courts in England. Mr. Crawford was granted a divorce from his wife, but Sir Charles Dilke was not proceeded against and therefore escaped conviction. The revelations, however, were of such a horrible character, and Sir Charles not having entered the witness box to deny them, they must consign him forever to political oblivion. A cable despatch states that Mr. Chamberlain, who has always been Dilke's warmest defender, has since the exposure cast off his quondam friend.

—The Ontario estimates for 1886 were submitted to the Legislature on Wednesday. The total amount of the estimates are $2,962,514, divided as follows:—Current expenditures $2,474,037, on capital account $460,304, other purposes $28,172. The estimates for 1885 were $345,871 less than the sum, and in 1884 $315,441 less. These figures are of course exclusive of the supplementary estimates which are usually brought down near the close of the session. Hon. A. M. Ross, treasurer, made his budget speech yesterday. A summary will be given next week.

—The notice given of a resolution to be introduced in the Local Legislature this week by Mr. D. J. McIntyre, M. P. P., of South Victoria, created quite a sensation. The motion will provide for an office in the new Parliament buildings for the Lieut.-Governor in which to transact his official business, and doing away with the Government House. The maintenance of Government House involves a large and unnecessary expenditure by the province which could be dispensed with. The salary of the Lieut.-Governor is sufficiently large to enable him to provide a house for himself. The motion should carry.

—For alleged corrupt politicians the Americans can set Canadians a good example. Only a few days ago public opinion forced Mr. Garland, the Attorney-General in President Cleveland's Cabinet, to surrender blind shares he had accepted in the Pan-Electric Co. to a charitable institution. It was argued that a Cabinet officer should not accept shares in a Company which was contesting the right of an existing Company to patents granted by the United States, and Garland had to choose between surrendering the shares or expulsion from the Cabinet. It is estimated that the shares he gave up will be worth at an early date one million dollars. The result of this protest by the press of the United States goes to show that there is a much higher sense of political honour in the United States than in Canada. Here members of Tory Cabinets have become wealthy by blind shares in the C. P. R and other railways, notable among whom are Sir Charles Tupper and Hon. John Henry Pope, whilst nearly three-fourths of the Tory members of Parliament have made large hauls from land and timber grants. Let it not be said after this that United States politics are more corrupt than Canadian. The Tory politician can now give his American prototype points in a match at robbing the public treasury.

ledge of the truthfulness of the charges. All he knew of Mr. Tinsdale's alleged misconduct was what people had told him. This closed the case. The counsel then addressed the court, Mr. Morden arguing that the charges were prompted by malice rather than by a desire to benefit the school. Dr. Hodgins made a short address, stating that the evidence would be submitted to the Minister of Education for his decision. He considered that the case should have been dealt with by the School Board and without troubling the Education Department. In referring to the evidence he said that he trusted that those teachers who were present and any young men present who might hereafter enter the profession, would take warning from what they had heard. A teacher should be like Cæsar's wife, above suspicion.

The charges against Mr. Anson Aylsworth were then taken up, Mr. Preston acting for the prosecutor, and Mr. Allan Aylesworth, of Toronto, for the defence. The charges were infidelity, telling immoral stories to the boys and permitting them to act in an indecent manner in the school room. The infidelity charge was ruled out by Dr. Hodgins. Mr. Aylsworth then submitted a written statement from defendant Aylsworth admitting that he had been indiscreet and promising to do better in future. Mr. Preston considered the apology insufficient and asked that the charges be investigated. Dr. Hodgins agreed to accept evidence on the charge of countenancing indecent exposure of a boy's person. Horace Faul, a lad of 15 years, upon whom the alleged indignity was said to have been perpetrated, was then called. Dr. Hodgins refused to take the boy's evidence on the ground that he was too young. Mr. Preston got riled at this and said he was not to be choked off in such a way. This remark displeased the Dr. and he asked Mr. Preston to withdraw the statement. Mr. Preston refused, and the Doctor then adjourned the court summarily. At this stage in the proceedings Mr. John D. Ham moved, seconded by Mr. Finkle, a vote of thanks from the Board of Education to Dr. Hodgins for the fair and impartial manner in which had conducted the investigation, which was carried. Dr. Hodgins replied, thanking the gentlemen for their resolution and expressing regret that there should have been any necessity for such an investigation. He hoped the school would in the future be better conducted. In closing he stated that he would continue the investigation if Mr. Preston would withdraw his offensive remark. Mr. Preston did so, and a boy named Evans, aged about 18, was called. He stated that he was present on the occasion when the boy Faul was exposed in the way mentioned, but Mr. Aylsworth was not in the room at the time. Mr. Aylsworth, the defendant, was also sworn and he testified that he was not present when any such thing had ever taken place. The case was then closed. Dr. Hodgins said that he would submit Mr. Aylsworth's statement to the Minister for decision. The Deputy Minister returned Thursday night to Toronto.

Attempted Rape.

In the Belleville police court on Monday last Hiram Phillips appeared to answer a charge of attempted rape upon the person of Margaret Ann Briggs. The prisoner was remanded until to-morrow (Saturday.) It is stated that on December 25th last the prisoner decoyed Miss Briggs by means of a letter to Millbridge, and by further false pretences induced her to drive with him to Bannockburn, during which journey he attempted to outrage her. The girl's screams were heard by George Jackson, a farmer living by the roadside, who rescued her from her assailant. Phillips left the neighbourhood immediately afterwards, and was captured and brought to Belleville on Saturday last.

da or in the older Eastern States. He showed the urgent necessity of fostering the introduction of industrial drawing into our schools, dwelling at some length on the more marked progress which England and France were making because of their special attention to this subject.

A vote of thanks was tendered to Dr. Hodgins who was elected an hon. member of the Lennox and Addington Teachers' Association in April, 1877, on the occasion of a former visit to Napanee.

The Dr. replied in fitting terms, showing his appreciation of the thanks rendered.

Messrs. Fraser and Black then placed before the teachers present the respective merits of the "Educational Weekly" and the "Canada School Journal," both strongly recommending the advisability of teachers subscribing to some live educational journal.

After a committee had been appointed to nominated the officers for the coming year, the session adjourned to meet in the town hall at 8 p.m.

ROBUST HEALTH

Is not always enjoyed by those who seem to possess it. The taint of corrupted blood may be secretly undermining the constitution. In time, the poison will certainly show its effects, and with all the more virulence the longer it has been allowed to permeate the system. Each pimple, sty, boil, skin disorder and sense of unnatural lassitude, or languor, is one of Nature's warnings of the consequences of neglect.

Ayer's Sarsaparilla

Is the only remedy that can be relied upon, in all cases, to eradicate the taint of hereditary disease and the special corruptions of the blood. It is the only alterative that is sufficiently powerful to thoroughly cleanse the system of Scrofulous and Mercurial impurities and the pollution of Contagious Diseases. It also neutralizes the poisons left by Diphtheria and Scarlet Fever, and enables rapid recuperation from the enfeeblement and debility caused by these diseases.

Myriads of Cures

Achieved by AYER'S SARSAPARILLA, in the past forty years, are attested, and there is no blood disease, at all possible of cure, that will not yield to it. Whatever the ailments of this class, and wherever found, from the scurvy of the Aretic circle to the "veldt-sores" of South Africa, this remedy has afforded health to the sufferers by whom it was employed. Druggists everywhere can cite numerous cases, within their personal knowledge, of remarkable cures wrought by it, where all other treatment had been unavailing. People will do well to

Trust Nothing Else

than AYER'S SARSAPARILLA. Numerous crude mixtures are offered to the public as "blood purifiers," which only allure the patient with the pretense of many cheap doses, and with which it is folly to experiment while disease is steadily becoming more deep-seated and difficult of cure. Some of these mixtures do much lasting harm. Bear in mind that the only medicine that can radically purify the vitiated blood is

TOWN COUNCIL.

Council met in regular session at the Council Chamber on Monday evening last. All the members were present. The minutes of last meeting were read and adopted, after which a petition was read from Messrs. P. Slaven, J. A. Sexsmith, Dr. Leonard, A. W. Grange, W. H. Bruton, and some other merchants in the vicinity, stating that the number of carters who congregate around the south-west corner of John and Dundas-sts., were a source of annoyance and loss to the stores in the immediate vicinity, praying that a license be placed upon the carters and a new stand given them.

Reeve CARSCALLEN moved, seconded by Coun. DAVIS, that the petition be referred to the Street Committee to report.

Coun. GIBBARD moved in amendment, seconded by Coun. JOY, that the petition be referred to the Printing and By-laws Committee, to draft a by-law appointing stands and imposing a small license fee. In support of his motion Mr. Gibbard said the license fee should be a merely nominal one, just sufficient to protect our local carters from interference from outsiders, and he was certain it would be most beneficient and satisfactory to all concerned.

Mr. SLAVEN being present was on motion heard by the council. He explained that his grievances did not arise from the carters themselves but from the large numbers of men who habitually loafed around the corner to the annoyance of everyone.

The original motion was carried.

A communication was read from Mr. W. Morrison of Toronto, calling the attention of the council to his chemical fire engines, which if introduced would not only minimize danger from fire but also greatly decrease the cost of insurance. The communication was referred to the Fire, Water and Gas Committee to report.

Dep-Reeve LAPUM presented the auditors' report, showing the total receipts of last year to be $46,228.80, with a balance on hand Jan. 1st of —Hundreds of people visit a cave, recently discovered, on the farm of Owen Reed, near Gilmour, on the Central Ontario railroad. It has four chambers, is composed of blue tinted rock, with a substance that sparkles with gold. There are many colors of paint, and balls of white clay jut out everywhere.

The discovery of the instantaneous process of taking photographs has been quickly followed in the medical world by a perfect and instantaneous remedy for all acute aches and pains, as neuralgia, toothache, rheumatism, etc. This valuable remedy is called Fluid Lightning, and is sold at 25 cents a bottle at Grange's or Huffman's drug store, Napanee, and at Jas. No trace whatever can be found of him. The pocketbook he carried was left in the store and the bank funds had not been touched. The cause of his disappearance is a mystery.

A Safeguard.

The fatal rapidity with which slight Colds and Coughs frequently develop into the gravest maladies of the throat and lungs, is a consideration which should impel every prudent person to keep at hand, as a household remedy, a bottle of AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL.

Nothing else gives such immediate relief and works so sure a cure in all affections of this class. That eminent physician, Prof. F. Sweetzer, of the Maine Medical School, Brunswick, Me., says:—

"Medical science has produced no other anodyne expectorant so good as AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL. It is invaluable for diseases of the throat and lungs."

The same opinion is expressed by the well-known Dr. L. J. Addison, of Chicago, Ill., who says:—

"I have never found, in thirty-five years of continuous study and practice of medicine, any preparation of so great value as AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL, for treatment of diseases of the throat and lungs. It not only breaks up colds and cures severe coughs, but is more effective than anything else in relieving even the most serious bronchial and pulmonary affections."

AYER'S
Cherry Pectoral

Is not a new claimant for popular confidence, but a medicine which is to-day saving the lives of the third generation who have come into being since it was first offered to the public.

There is not a household in which this invaluable remedy has once been introduced where its use has ever been abandoned, and there is not a person who has ever given it a proper trial for any throat or lung disease susceptible of cure, who has not been made well by it.

AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL has, in numberless instances, cured obstinate cases of chronic Bronchitis, Laryngitis, and even acute Pneumonia, and has saved many patients in the earlier stages of Pulmonary Consumption. It is a medicine that only requires to be taken in small doses, is pleasant to the taste, and is needed in every house where there are children, as there is nothing so good as AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL for treatment of Croup and Whooping Cough.

These are all plain facts, which can be verified by anybody, and should be remembered by everybody.

Dep-Reeve LAPUM presented the auditors' report, showing the total receipts of last year to be $48,228.80, with a balance on hand Jan. 1st of $902.21. The report was referred to the Finance Committee to report.

The Finance Committee reported recommending that the taxes on the Brush Works for 1885 be remitted.—Adopted.

Coun. JOY presented pay list No. 3, amounting to $74.59, which was adopted.

Reeve CARSCALLEN, chairman of the Fire, Water and Gas Committee, reported that on Saturday evening last a gentleman representing a Waterworks Company, had called upon him and on behalf of his employers, stated that they would erect the waterworks and trust to selling them afterwards to the town. He only asked the privilege of laying the mains on the streets. The Reeve had told him he must make his offer in writing to be presented to the council.

The Town Property Committee reported that they had repaired nearly all the seats in the Town Hall, which would require further strengthening by the addition of iron braces to prevent spreading. The latter work would cost about $10. The committee was instructed to have the work done.

The Printing and By-laws Committee reported payment of the following accounts:—Templeton & Beeman, $15; W. M. O'Beirne, $4. The report was adopted.

The Market Committee reported that they had leased the stalls in the market building at $20 each and received license fees from outside butchers. The report was adopted.

The Poor and Sanitary Committee reported a fortnightly expenditure of $14.23, leaving a balance due the committee of $28.25. The report was adopted. Re the poor house the committee reported that they did not consider it advisable to build such at this season of the year and could offer no suggestion as to providing relief for the poor, as nothing had since been heard of the scheme propounded by the Archdeacon. The committee were waiting for the ministers to take some action in the matter. They would recommend that a poor house be erected about the first of next October. The report was adopted.

On motion the Fire, Water and Gas Committee were instructed to purchase from John Lowry ten cedar buoys at 10c. each.

Coun. GIBBARD moved that the Street Committee be instructed to build all crossings this year of cedar blocks, and that the cedar for the same be purchased in the meantime.—Carried.

The annual list of lands liable to be sold for back taxes was presented and referred to the Finance Committee with power to act.

The collector's time was, on motion, extended until the next meeting of the council.

Dep-Reeve LAPUM moved, seconded by Coun. AYLSWORTH, that the Finance Committee be instructed to draft a by-law to regulate the license fees on the opera house and other places of amusement.—Carried.

On motion the Town Property Committee were authorized to erect a partition in the police office for the purpose of forming apart a private office.

On motion Mr. C. Peterson's note for eight months for $8.50 due on back taxes was accepted.

Coun. GIBBARD moved, seconded by Coun. BOWEN, that the Street Committee be instructed to have stone broken to the amount of 100 toise.

Coun. DAVIS moved in amendment, seconded by Reeve CARSCALLEN, that 150 toise be broken.

The original motion was carried.

The sum of $20 was paid by the Mechanics' Institute for rent of Council Chamber three evenings a week. On motion the money was refunded to the Institute.

The following accounts were disposed of:—Mr. Conway, lighting lamp at covered bridge, $1.50, paid; John Vine, carting, 50c., paid; Jos. Whitmarsh, shovelling, $4.40, paid; William Hooper, cutting ice and shovelling, $2.50, paid; J. Storms, one ticket to Kingston, etc., $1.15, paid; Ferguson Bros., hardware, $5.18, paid; B. Johnston, drawing fire engine, $2, paid $1; A. S. Kimmerly, deputy returning officer, $2, paid.

On motion $50 was granted to the Poor and Sanitary Committee.

The council then adjourned.

Joyful News.

It is certainly glad tidings to the poor invalid to be informed of a remedy that will give prompt and sure relief in case of painful suffering. Such a remedy is Hagyard's Yellow Oil, adapted for internal and external use in all ordinary aches, pains, lameness and soreness. It cures rheumatism, neuralgia, sore throat, croup and all inflammatory pains.

Threatened Danger.

In the fall of '84 Randall Miller, of Maitlands, N.S., was prostrated to his bed with an attack of incipient consumption. Cough remedies all failed. He rapidly grew debilitated, and friends despaired of his recovery. He tried Burdock Blood Bitters, with immediate relief, followed by a speedy cure.

be imposed on with other useless preparations, recommended to be as good. Use only McGregor & Parke's Carbolic Cerate. Sold at Grange's or Huffman's drug store, Napanee, and at Jas. Aylsworth's, Tamworth.

—On Saturday morning at 7 o'clock two freight trains collided on the G. T. R. between Montreal and Cornwall, and serious damage was done. One engine was standing straight up on its end; the other lay in the ditch. The contents of fifteen cars were scattered over a wide space of ground. The accident will cost $40,000, and it is said to have been the result of a misunderstanding of orders.

—The body of unknown man was found beside the G. T. R. track about 1¼ west of Port Hope station Thursday morning last. At the coroner's inquest it was found that nearly every bone in the unfortunate man's body was broken besides a few large cuts. The G. T. authorities were exonerated from all blame in the matter. It is supposed he was struck by an engine while walking on the track during the night.

—John Doreen, hotelkeeper, Fred. Macauley, grain buyer, Sandy McCabe and Thos. Munley, of Shannonville, were arraigned at Belleville last Friday charged with assaulting and doing bodily harm to David L. Brown, a magistrate and member of Tyendinaga Township Council. A row took place over the name of a trotting horse belonging to Brown, and he was badly beaten. His face was cut, causing paralysis. Macauley was the only one sent up for trial.

—A young man, son of a widow, living in a village near Kingston, on Wednesday of last week, stole from his mother $150. He went to Kingston and for four days put in a riotous time, spending at the rate of $25 per day. His mother did not know whither he had gone until Saturday. Then she found him. He had in his possession only $50. He was tried on Tuesday at Kingston and appeared quite penitent, begging to be released on the promise of being a better boy in future. He was dismissed.

Rev. G. J. Fallis, Dutton, certifies: "For some years my wife has been troubled with dyspepsia, and has tried one thing after another recommended with but little or no effect till advised to give McGregor's Speedy Cure a trial. Since taken the first bottle I have noticed a decided improvement, and can with confidence recommend it to be one of, if not the best medicine extant for dyspepsia." This invaluable medicine for liver complaint, indigestion, kidney complaint, is purely vegetable. Sold at Grange's or Huffman's drug store, Napanee, and at Jas. Aylsworth's, Tamworth.

—Wm. H. Wilkinson was charged at Picton last week with stealing some clothes and $4 from Mr. Cassedy, of Hillier. Wilkinson is one Miss Rye's proteges and came out from the slums of London several years ago. He has been sent to the central prison from here twice and had only got out of the penitentiary about the latter part of Dec. He was arrested for the theft in Hillier and escaped from Constable Beadle's cutter while the latter was in a house a few minutes. The constable secured him again in Big Island. He pleaded guilty and was sentenced to three years in the penitentiary. Wilkinson is now a strapping heavy set fellow of about 21 years.

Weather Probabilities.

The probabilities are that we shall have much damp, chilly, sloppy weather during the coming season—just the weather to contract sudden colds. Be prepared for them by having on hand Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam, a safe, agreeable and speedy cure for colds and their consequences.

MANHOOD

HOW LOST. HOW RESTORED!

We have recently published a new edition of Dr. Culverwell's Celebrated Essay on the radical and permanent cure (without medicine) of Nervous Debility Mental and Physical Incapacity, Impediments to Marriage, &c., resulting from excesses.

☞ Price, in a sealed envelope, only 6 cents, or two postage stamps.

The celebrated author, in his admirable Essay, clearly demonstrates, from thirty years' successful practice, that alarming consequences may be radically cured without the dangerous use of internal medicines or the use of the knife; pointing out a mode of cure at once simple, certain and effectual, by means of which every sufferer, no matter what his condition may be, may cure himself cheaply, privately and radically.

☞ This Lecture should be in the hands of every youth and every man in the land.

Choice Recipes.

APPLE CUSTARD.—Lay a crust in your plates; slice apples thin and half fill your plates; pour over them a custard made of four eggs and one quart of milk, sweetened and seasoned to your taste.

MOCK BOLOGNA SAUSAGE.—One part of beef, two parts pork, one part beef suet, a little garlic, sage, black pepper, a small portion of cayenne pepper. Season to taste. Stuff tightly in cloth bags and hang them in a dry place.

FIG PUDDING.—Delicious: One pound of figs, one pound of beef suet, one pound of bread crumbs, one pound brown sugar, six eggs. Chop the figs fine, along with the bread crumbs; boil two hours in a mold well buttered; eat with butter sauce. Any other fruit may be used in place of figs.

TEA ROLLS —Make them up at 12 o'clock in the day. One quart of flour, one-half pint of new milk, and one gill of yeast—one teaspoonful of sugar in the yeast is an improvement. When light, work in a tablespoonful of butter and the yelks of two eggs, then set it again to rise for half an hour before baking. Roll them out and make into any shape you prefer.

OYSTER SOUP.—Put on in a brass kettle one quart of oysters; let them cook until they are nearly done without boiling hard (which makes them tough); stir in a piece of butter about as large as a walnut, rub it thoroughly into one and a half tablespoons of flour, add one quart of rich milk When it boils up once the soup is done. Season with pepper and salt. Pour it into the tureen on a quantity of small pieces of bread. This will be enough for six or seven persons.

SPLENDID OMELET—From four to eight very fresh eggs; break them singly and carefully. When they are sufficiently whisked, pour them through a sieve and resume the beating until they are very light; add to them half a teaspoonful of salt, season with pepper. Dissolve in a small frying-pan two ounces of butter, pour in the eggs, and as soon as the omelet is well risen and firm throughout slide it into a hot dish, fold it together like a turnover, and serve at once.

POTATO SALAD.—Slice thinly eight or ten good-sized Irish potatoes (boiled and cold); chop finely one good-sized apple, one and a half small onions, rinse and chop the leaves of a large handful of green-parsley. Spread a layer of the potato in a chopping tray, sprinkle liberally with salt, then half the parsley, apple, and onions, then the rest of the potato, then more salt and the other half of the parsley, apple, and onion; pour half a teacup of sweet oil or melted butter over the whole, with a small cup of vinegar. Mix the whole carefully so as not to break the potatoes.

A subscriber asks a recipe for common biscuit. Will some lady reader kindly furnish her rule?

Household Hints.

Sweet oil mixed with melted beeswax and applied with a soft flannel cloth to wooden furniture will give the wood a high polish. It is particularly effective on mahogany and is what was used in southern families before the war, when polished mahogany tables and chairs were the pride of every housekeeper. The mixture should be well rubbed into the wood, and then polished with a dry piece of chamois.

QUEBEC'S AWFUL DANGER.

The Gate of the St. Lawrence Menaced.

The Detroit Tribune the other day contained an article headed, "Scared Sir John A.—Why did the Canadian Premier make a sudden trip to England?"

A prominent Irishman, who was in Quebec last Autumn, asked the newspaper in question:

"Why were two companies of artillery summoned to Quebec unexpectedly and without apparent cause a short time ago? Why did Sir John Macdonald hasten off to England also without apparent cause?" He continued as follows: "The Canadian papers have been trying to account for these things, seemingly unconnected, but they couldn't see right, for they looked with partisan glasses. The reform press tried to ascribe John A.s' sudden departure to fear that some of the French, angry at his course in the North-West rebellion, might kill him. The Conservative papers denied this imputation of cowardice. But the public remained and still remains, in the deepest ignorance of the motive of the trip. While in Quebec I conceived a plan for

but I saw no good opportunity then of acting on it. When the Canadian Government became engaged with the discontented half-breeds and the Indians, I communicated my plans to a few personal friends in Detroit whom I could trust. The immediate result was a series of meetings, some at my home, some at the residence of my friend. These meetings grew larger and larger, until, at last, we were obliged to rent a hall on Michigan avenue. Over 100 young men were let into the secret, mostly gentlemen of means, all educated and daring men who could be relied upon in any emergency. At last it was all arranged. Seventy-five of us were to proceed to Quebec in groups. On a certain day and at a certain hour we were to visit the citidel, all armed with 44 calibre Smith & Wesson self-acting revolvers. The smallest of us were to be women, or as much so as smooth faces, wigs, skirts, and padding could make us. When all had gained entrance, I was to throw handfuls of silver to the soldiers and so collect them at the gate. At that moment my companions were to draw their revolvers and

DRIVE THE MILITARY OUT.

This appeared to all of us as easy as rolling off a log. We had no doubt that after gaining possession and arming ourselves properly we could retain possession until aid should arrive. Riel was beaten and sentenced to be hanged. All Quebec was furious. The allegiance of the French Canadians, merely nominal, after all, was knocked into a cocked-hat. We felt that our time had approached, since we might expect material aid from the Lower Canadians, and we began our final preparations. Good men in all the New England cities were communicated with. They assured us that on two hours' notice they could summon large numbers of men. The old Fenian organization, though practically inert, could give efficient aid with men and arms. All was finally arranged that the hour of our assault 2000 men would be on their way, by rail and by water, to Quebec. They would arrive within a few hours afterwards and reach us under cover of our guns. With their aid we could withstand any force sent against us. This much gained we would establish a direct line of communication with the United States and, making Quebec the base of our operations, overrun the Dominion. Undoubtedly we could enlist the French on our side by giving them a free state. Victory would be certain. We felt that all else ed with a dry piece of chamois.

There is quite an art in pressing the seams of a dress made at home to give it a good finish. The bodice and sleeves seams ought not to be ironed on a flat surface, but over a roller covered with flannel; this gives them the true tailor's set. An ordinary rolling-pin, such as is used for pastry, will do. The white felt or flannel covering it must be caught tightly together and overcast, but the edges must not overlap, as they would cause a ridge. All the seams of a bodice are ironed over this, and the difference over those ironed on a flat surface must be seen to be believed.

The secret of good puff paste, or even plain, is to have the butter waxy. Wash it in ice water and flatten it into wafers; put it into a cold window. It should be almost brittle. If you keep to this rule about the butter, and always work it in with a knife, flouring your hands when you have to touch the paste, you will have light pastry. A tablespoon of salt and one of sugar go to a quart of flour for light paste. Add the water judiciously, as too much water makes pastry hard.

The Latest Tramp Dodge.

Right in the midst of the late January blizzard, a forlorn-looking tramp was blown to the front door of a cottage, and when the woman came out at his knock, he handed her a little note-book, with the request: "Please write my name in this 'ere leedle book."

"Certainly I will. What name, please?"

"My name is Jim Barto, but I want yer to write it so that people will take me for Sam Scadger. I don't want my real name to become known in this town."

"Does anybody in this town know you?"

"No, ma'am."

"Then what difference does it make what name you call yourself?"

"Well, you see, ma'am, I hev a dear old mother livin' in this County, and, as I'm dyin' of starvation, I want ter hide my real name, so that when your neighbors find a dead man on the street, with nothin' in his stomach but a whist of oat straw, my poor old mother will never know it was her poor, wayward son."

That Christian lady stuffed his worthless hide so full of well-cooked grub th it is not likely he'll take to eating oat straw for several days.

Bismarck and Gladstone.

Dr. Theodore Cuyler, in addressing the Yale students lately, referred as follows to Bismarck and Gladstone:—

"To my personal knowledge, the greatest man in modern Germany is a Christian, and Gladstone, perhaps the most powerful intellect of modern times, stands side by side with Bismarck in this respect. With my own eyes I have seen Mr. Gladstone kneel by the side of a common street sweeper and pray for the salvation of his soul. I know of no grander sight than the Premier of England and the leading statesman of the world kneeling by the side of a common street sweeper and pouring forth his eloquent appeal to God in behalf of his humble brother."

CAPTURE THE CITADEL,

for that success would kindle the fires of enthusiasm in every Irish heart, and thousands of hands would be extended to aid us. Five days before we were ready to put our plans in operation one of the men whom we had already despatched to Quebec telegraphed me in cypher that two companies of artillery had been ordered to Quebec; that the citadel guards had been strengthened and kept closely to duty, and that but few persons were allowed to collect within the walls at one time. I notified my co-conspirators immediately. Why should these precautions be taken at that moment? we asked ourselves. The fever of excitement in the province of Quebec had passed away, and there were no symptoms of a French Canadian outbreak. We were unable to solve the puzzle, but made up our mind that something had gone wrong. On the following day we learned from Buffalo that a man from that city, who had promised his aid and been informed of our plans, had been seen at Sir John A. Macdonald's residence in Canada. I immediately notified my friends of what had occurred, and our excursion was declared off. Since then the Buffalo man emigrated to Canada.

"Sir John's sudden trip to England about that time was, I have reason to believe, to confer with the home authorities on the scheme which we had prepared."

Murdered by a Madman.

A Victoria, B. C., despatch says: A horrible tragedy is reported to have occurred on the road between New Westminster and Port Moody. A man named Walker has squatted on some land and the other day he took L. Robson, his partner Smith, and another man named Jones to the place, wishing to dispose of his right. They arrived at the ranch late in the afternoon, and after dark Walker picked up a double-barrelled shot gun and said he was going to shoot a crow. One of the men remarked that it was rather late to go shooting, when Walker said he might as well tell them his intention, that he was going to cook their goose for them. He then shot Robson through the breast, killing him instantly. Jones attempted to take the gun away from the murderer, but he received the contents of the second barrel in the leg, shattering his knee. Walker then made for Smith with a knife, but the latter succeeded in getting out of the cabin and escaped. Walker then lashed Jones to the body of Robson and fled. The wounded and dead men were found by constables, who arrived a few hours later. The dead body of Walker was soon afterwards found. He is supposed to have killed himself.

THE MURDERED MAN.

D. L. Robson, murdered by a squatter in British Columbia, is a Kingstonian, and a step-brother of Mrs. Black, wife of the Montreal City Treasurer. He was in Montreal last winter, and only a week before the murder he wrote a letter to a nephew here, saying that as soon as he purchased the claim of a squatter he would start for Kingston again. He was wealthy, and was probably murdered for his money.

They must needs move slowly who would move surely and successfully up the hill of knowledge. Haste does only harm; things must have their natural course, and they who cannot wait should cease all expectation and hope, and betake themselves to some other pursuit.

THE FARM.

Forcing Rhubarb and Asparagus.

A method which we have frequently practiced is to dig up, in the fall, or at any time during winter when the ground is not frozen, a number of clumps with as many roots attached as possible, and place them close together in a cold frame, sprinkle fine soil between and over them, water copiously with lukewarm water, level again with soil, cover all with a few inches of dry leaves and put on the sashes. The subsequent care is the same as required for ordinary cold-frames, giving air on mild days, and secure covering in cold weather. Water is rarely needed, as the leaves prevent rapid evaporation. When cold-frames are not available, the roots may be taken into a warm cellar, under a window if possible, and covered with soil and leaves, or straw. Plants in a cellar need more water than in a frame, and the water given should be lukewarm.

Another, and very easy way to forward Rhubarb, is to turn a one-headed barrel over a strong plant, and bank fresh horse-manure all round and over it. The bottom of the barrel should have several holes bored through it to facilitate the escape of superabundant heat and gases, else the stalks are apt to grow up sickly and decay.

Timely Suggestions.

Keep no unprofitable cows over winter. The present is the time to cull the herd, if it has not been done already. Ten chances to one you are keeping one or more cows that do not pay for the feed they eat. You can easily ascertain which cows are profitable for cream by setting a little milk from each cow in a tumbler, or better in a cream gauge. There will be a difference in the thickness of the cream, and that very marked, unless your cows are all of the same breed, and even then the difference in the cream may be noticeable.

A good condition powder may be cheaply prepared on the farm. A mixture of one pound penugreek, one pound of gentian, one pound salt, one pound sulphate of soda, an ounce of sulphur, pound of phosphate of soda, half a pound of chloride of iron, and half a pound of black antimony, given in tablespoonful doses twice a day, will greatly assist the appetite and promote the condition of the animals.

A farmer s scrap-book should be kept on every well-regulated farm. There are thousands of recipes for the curing of sick animals which may be of great value if referred to at the proper time. Useful hints regarding special crops may be forgotten unless preserved in this manner, convenient for reference. Plans for farm buildings or their interior management may be preserved until wanted. Gates, fences, ditches, and the numerous other things which make up the business of the farm, require frequent repairs or entire construction, and the hints and helps which may be afforded if the scrap-book has been well kept are of immense value.

The necessity of keeping horses away from quagmires in the public roads is shown by the manner in which one of my horses is affected since it became stalled in one not long ago. Since the occurrence, whenever the horse touches a soft place in the road it trembles all over with fear, every muscle in its body seeming to shake, and it has to be led away from the spot, refusing to be driven.

Crumbly Butter.

Winter-made butter carries its own certificate of quality. It is usually white and tallowy, and crumbles into small fragments. It is always deficient in the oily part of the fat. Fat consists of three acids—stearic, margaric, and oleic, combined with glycerine. Stearic acid, or stoerine, is hard, white, and friable; oleic acid, or oleine, is yellow, soft, and oily, and dilutes the whiter and harder stearine and margarine. In the winter the oleine of the butter is in much less proportion, being used up in making fat to keep the animal warm. And unless food that is rich in oil is provided for the cows, the butter made in the winter will always be hard and crumbly, and white in color. This fact applies also to some cows, which consume the oleine of the food, and consequently make white, hard butter at all times; but much more so in winter than in summer, while other's make rich, yellow, and oily butter. The rich butter of the Jersey cows is associated with a lean carcass, while some other cows are always fat and sleek, but their butter is white and of poor flavor.

Much however, may be done in the way of feeding to secure an excellent quality of butter, even in winter. Some of those who have made winter dairying a special business are much troubled by the poor quality of the butter, and farmers generally, who make butter this season, complain almost universally of the same difficulty. While some part of it lies in the cows, beyond doubt, yet the greater part of the difficulty is in the feeding, and dairymen must provide an abundance of food that is rich in oily matter, to supply both the want of the cow for herself to sustain the vital warmth and to leave an abundant surplus for the butter. A caution may be given against depending on the so-called oilmeals for this purpose. By the new processes in use in the mills every particle of oil in cottonseed and linseed is taken out, by means of benzine, or naphtha, as it is sometimes called, which dissolves the oil and leaves the meal entirely free of it. Formerly those meals contained from 10 to 18 per cent. of oil, and they were then most valuable food for fattening and the butter dairy. Now they are of no use for making fat, excepting so far as their protein elements may be converted into it by a roundabout transformation; but it is known that fat, given in the food, is formed into an emulsion by the process of mastication and digestion, and is assimilated directly and taken into the blood by the way of the lacteal vessels and the portal vein. If we want to get rich milk we must feed food rich in oil; and the best food of this kind we can use is hay or fodder, so that it is thoroughly masticated and made to yield up its oil to the action of the saliva.

"Do Nots" for the Driver.

Lord Hampden, who presided at a recent dinner of the London Cab-Drivers' Benevolent Association, commended to the members the following lines relating to the proper care of the horse, which, he said, he had hung up in his own stables:

Up hill—whip me not.
Down hill—hurry me not.
On level road—spare me not.
Loose in stable—forget me not.
Of hay and corn—rob me not.
Of clean water—stint me not.
With sponge and brush—neglect me not.
Of soft, dry bed—deprive me not.
Tired or hot—leave me not.
Sick or cold—chill me not.
With bit and reins—oh, jerk me not.
When you are angry—strike me not.

Throat Troubles in Winter.

BY D. N. PATTERSON, M D.

The habit which many people have of always muffling up the throat during the winter, is a mistake. It not unfrequently happens that those people commence this prac ice early in the fall, and continue to do so until late in the spring. The result is, that if they should happen to leave off their scarf or muffler for a few hours, they are very likely to take cold. The wearing of this additional and unnecessary neck covering tends only to render the neck and throat more sensitive, and consequently entails a greater liability to take cold. Even with the severe weather which we sometimes have, the days are few when it is necessary to "bundle up" the neck and head, as many do every day throughout the winter. The mistake lies first, in commencing to wrap up too early in the fall. A little process of judicious hardening of the throat and neck would soon enable one to continue until well into the winter, without the employment of such additional covering. The turning up of the coat collar; or a light handkerchief, would be found to be sufficient.

Throat troubles are due not so much to climate, as to the care, or rather the neglect of attention to the rules of health, which should govern the daily life of every person. But one thing should always be remembered, and that is, all mufflers or wraps should at once be removed fron the neck upon entering the house, church, lecture room, concert hall, etc; in fact, whenever one goes from out doors into a ny artificially heated room. The term throat disease comprisrs a large number of affections of that organ and its immediate connecting structures, nearly all of which are to a greater or less extent, dependent upon a catarrhal inflammation of the mucous membrane of those parts. Now catarrh, when located there, or in some other part of the body, is always due to a succession of sudden changes to which the body is subjected in one way or another. Once alone will not usually do it, but let people get well warmed up, and then suddenly expose themselves to the cold, and it will not take many such times to establish a catarrh of throat and lungs, which it may be a difficult thing to eradicate entirely from the system.

We hear a great deal said about the air in certain localities being "too strong" for weak lungs. But the fault is not in the air, but in the ability of one who has weak lungs to withstand that, which to a strong, healthy and robust person, would be only what a vigorous nature absolutely requires. The trouble is, too many people are like hothouse plants. They allow themselves to grow into the habit, by which they are only comfortable in a room at 80°. One writer has aptly remarked that pure air, and plenty of it, night as well as day, even if it be damp and cold, salt laden, providing it is not permitted to fall in draughts on the person, is one of the best prophylactics against taking cold.

Many people are troubled more or less of the time with hoarseness. In this connection it may be incidentally remarked that horseradish is a most excellent remedy for this trouble, and usually affords speedy relief as soon as it is used. The root is to be eaten green, and not after it has dried. Another most excellent remedy for throat troubles, and one which is within reach of every one, is common salt. Those people who use a great deal of salt are less subject to dryness and inflammation of the throat, than those who do not. A very good way to use it is to prepare it in the form of a

THE LOGIC OF EVENTS.

How a Mistake in Filling a Prescription Led to a Marriage.

"Well, well," said Mrs. Catson, putting aside a newspaper and turning to her husband, "a pair of earrings caused the Burmese war, I never heard of anything so strange."

"Oh," said Mr. Catson, "I have heard of stranger things."

"Nonsense."

"Well, I have, and I'll give you an example. One night in Boston a young man, meeting an acquaintance, said: 'Come, let's have a drink.' I never was in Boston, but that remark brought about our marriage."

"Why, George," exclaimed Mrs. Catson "you are foolish. Neither of us were ever in Boston. You must be losing your mind."

"Tell you what I'll do; I promised to get you a new cloak, didn't I?"

"Yes."

"Well, now I'll bet you the cloak that I can prove my assertion."

"All right."

"If I succeed, you don't get the cloak."

"I understand."

"Well, one night in Boston about ten years ago, a young man, meeting a friend, asked him to come out and have a drink. The friend, a drug clerk, did so. He took several drinks and got drunk. That settled it."

"Settled what?"

"The fact of our marriage."

"How can you be so foolish?"

"Never mind, I'll explain. The drug clerk got drunk and went to the store. Shortly afterward a servant girl entered and handed him a prescription. In putting it up he used morphine instead of quinine. The girl went away, and delivered the medicine to Mrs. Potter who took it and died."

"Oh, what's the use of prolonging this foolishness?"

"Hold on. The death of that woman drew you and me closer together than we ever were before."

"We were not acquainted with each other ten years ago."

"That is very true, but wait. Mr. Potter, the lady's husband, was almost crazed by grief. He could stay in New York no longer, so he came down to Kentucky and, after awhile, went into business. Don't see any light yet, do you?"

"Oh, hush."

"Wait a minute. He had not been in business long until I met him. He took a fancy to me and gave me employment. After I had been with him several years, he sent me to Arkansaw. I had been in this State but a short time until I met you. Summary: If the friend had not asked the drug clerk to drink on one certain occasion he would not have got drunk. If he hadn't been drunk he would not have made a mistake in filling the prescription, and had he not made a mistake, Mrs. Potter would not have been killed, and had she not died, Potter would not have left New York, and had he not left that city I should not have met him, and had I not gone into business with him—"

"Oh, for goodness sake, hush. You are enough to drive anybody crazy."

She arose and left the room. Her husband mused: "I'll make her another bet. I'll bet she doesn't get that cloak. I have always thought that the logic of events failed to meet with proper appreciation in this country."

Wild Winds.

Oh! oh! how the wild winds blow!
Blow high,
Blow low,
And whirlwinds go
So chase the little leaves that fly,
Fly low and high,
To hollow and to steep hillside;
They shiver in the dreary weather,
And creep in little heaps together,
And nestle close and try to hide;
Oh! oh! how the wild winds blow!
Blow low,
Blow high,
And whirlwinds try
To find a crevice, to find a crack.—
They whirl to the front, they whirl to the back
But Tommy and Will and Baby, together,
Are snug and safe from the winter weather.
All the winds that blow
Cannot touch a toe,
Cannot twist or twirl,
One silky curl;
Though they rattle the door in a noisy pack,
The blazing fires will drive them pack.

Jack's Raccoon.

We have a raccoon! We have had him two weeks. He is half Bob's, and half mine.

Mr. Brownhill caught him and tamed him, and then gave him to us.

Papa says he is quite a superior man, and I think so too. (Mamma says I must explain that I mean Mr. Brownhill.)

The raccoon is a perfect beauty; gray, with black rings on his tail, and his tail is a great bushy tail; and some black stripes on his body, and a sharp-pointed, black nose, and such bright eyes! They are black, too, and they twinkle all the time. They twinkle so that Alice (she is one of my sisters) says —

"Twinkle, twinkle, little coon!
How your voice is out of tune.
Every time I hear you speak,
It is just a horrid squeak."

He does squeak, but I don't think it's horrid, any more than the noise her kitten makes.

Well, he belongs to Bob and me together, as I told you; so one week he lives at our house, and the next week he lives at Bob's, and we are going to teach him a new trick every week.

It is Bob's week now, and I miss him very much, though of course I see him every day.

He knows some tricks already.

You give him some snow, and he sits up and makes it into snowballs, patting it with his funny little black hands (of course they are paws, but they really look like hands), till he makes it quite round and hard, and then he rolls it about, or else he throws it away, and then looks at you to give him some more.

He doesn't like to have his feet wet, so when they get wet, he pats them against the wall until they are dry.

He did that in mamma's room one day, and left the marks of his feet all over the pretty pink paper; and mamma whipped him. But I don't suppose he knew that the paper was pink, or pretty either.

I love him very much, and he sits on my shoulder, for he is a young one, and not very big yet.

You ought to see Tom, our great yellow cat, when Coon pulls his tail! He humps himself up and growls, and gets very angry. You see, he knows it isn't a cat, and he knows it isn't a dog, but he doesn't know what it is.

Bob has just been here, after I had written that; and oh! what do you think Coon has been doing at his house?

Well, you see, he likes to go to sleep on the window sill in the kitchen, where the sun shines in. Bob left him there, sound asleep, all curled up in a ball, with his tail to dryness and inflammation of the throat, than those who do not. A very good way to use it is to prepare it in the form of a gargle. Take a heaping teaspoonful of salt in a tumbler of water, and gargle three or four times a day. It is well to avoid going out in the cold for fifteen or twenty minutes after using it.

Many do not know to what dangers one is liable who has a severe sore throat. I do not mean diphtheretic sore throat, but the common non-specific sore throat. The danger to be feared, and consequently to be avoided, is ulceration. If this takes place, the case becomes one of a serious nature. Prompt care and attention will generally pevent this additional and serious complication. For dryness of the throat, a small piece of muriate of ammonia, ten or fifteen grains every two or three hours, will be found very serviceable. It is best taken dry in the mouth and allowed to slowly dissolve.

Aspiration.

A fluid often accumulates in one or more cavities of the body, causing much harm by its pressure, and frequently resulting in death. It is sometimes due to inflammation, which increases the natural secretion of the parts, and sometimes to obstructions of the blood-vessels, causing their distention and a leakage, or exudation, of the watery parts of the blood through their walls. The fluid is generally thin, limpid and colorless, or slightly yellow, or, more rarely, gelatinous and turbid. When it is due to inflammation, it tends to become purulent and fetid.

A secreting membrane covers the lungs, and, turning back, lines the sides of the chest, thus forming a closed cavity. A similar one lines every closed cavity of the body, and secretes a thin, lubricating fluid which prevents all friction between adjacent parts. This fluid is called serum. All cavities which opens into the outer world—the mouth, stomach, intestines, bladder, etc.—are lined with a membrane that secretes mucus, a thicker fluid.

A serum-secreting membrane, similar to that which invests the lungs, lines the sac (pericardium) that encloses the heart, also the entire cavity of the abdomen, all the joints of the body, and equally covers and surrounds the brain, dipping down into and lining its ventricles and convolutions. Thus, in pleurisy, "water" may so accumulate between the chest and the lungs as not only to impede but wholly prevent the action of the latter; between the heart and its sac, so as to interfere with the action both of the heart and the lungs; within the abdomen, to the amount sometimes of gallons; within the joints, especially of the knee, and upon the brain, or within its ventricles.

"Tapping" the brain has long been practised, to the great relief of the patient, though temporary, as, the cause remaining, the water rapidly accumulates again. But it is not yet twenty years since the invention of the "aspirator," a great advance on the so-called "trocar."

It is a hollow needle,—the finest only one-fiftieth of an inch in diameter,—attached to a rubber tube, the latter connected with a glass syringe having a piston, stopcocks, and a discharging tube. The hollow needle penetrating to the fluid, the working of the piston creates a vacuum, when the fluid rises up into the instrument and flows out through the tube.

By using cocaine to abolish sensation in the punctured part, or benumbing the surface with a spray of ether, the operation may be rendered painless, all sensation being confined to the nerves of the skin.

The pride of Summer is that which goes before a Fall.

PUTTING THINGS AWAY.

THE MAN.

Man puts things out of the way whenever the necessity of so doing presents itself to him. For example, he finds that his room is in a disorderly state. Too many pairs of boots make themselves painfully obvious; there are more discarded collars on the mantel than propriety would dictate; and the mixture of cigar ashes, clothes brushes, and gloves on his table has reached a stage of confusion which displeases him, He resloves to put things in order and put out of the way whatever is plainly adapted to the process. Accordingly he crowds the superfluous boots under the sofa, thrusts smaller articles of personal apparel into the drawers, empties the cigar ashes and bits of waste paper behind his desk, and thus quickly sets his room in order. Now the result of this process is eminently satisfactory. Not only has he put things out of the way, but he is in a position to find them again as soon as he wants them. The sofa stands faithfully on guard over the boots, and he can at any time poke them out with a cane. The discarded collars, the gloves, the pipes and the various small articles thrown into the drawers, remain there, and the ashes and waste paper could be exhumed from behind the desk, were any possible demand for them to arise.

THE WOMAN.

Of course this masculine process of putting things out of the way excites the derision of woman. She claims it is the worst form and last expression of disorder. To put things away, as the art is practised by women, is equivalent to concealing them more or less completely.

The desire to put things away amounts in most women to a passion. Curiously enough it is always the things of other people—her husband or her children—that she puts away. Her own she wisely keeps where they are handy; and she resents the suggestion, no matter where they may be, they can ever be regarded as objects out of place. All other things, on the other hand, are, in her opinion, always out of place provided they are visible. Her chief object in life is to put them away where no one can see them, and her greatest happiness is attained when she has put them away so securely that she herself cannot remember where they are. Books and papers of a kind which a man is apt to need at any moment are always put away by women of eager enthusiasm. Winter clothing is put away in spring with such success that the owner is convinced that it has been stolen. In short there is nothing that woman will not gladly and effectually put away if it belongs exclusively to a man.

Two men called up the telegraph operator at East Weymouth, Mass., recently, and got him to go to the depot at midnight in order to send a telegram. As he entered the station the men drew revolvers and demanded the money in the safe, knowing it temporarily contained a large amount. Quick as a flash the operator whipped out a pistol and "got the drop upon the would be robbers, who fled in terror.

Although a banker, and one of the best business men in the world, the late Lord Mayor of London, Sir R. N. Fowler, writes so atrocious a hand that a sentence which he intended to be read as follows, "I regard the conduct of the Government in this matter as absolutely inhuman," was, owing to the inability of a printer to decipher what was meant, transformed in type into "I rarely can compass a tale. My grandmother is the best narrator of amusing incidents."

the window sill in the kitchen, where the sun shines in. Bob left him there, sound asleep, all curled up in a ball, with his tail all over his nose; that is the way he sleeps, and he looks so funny, you can't think!

By-and-by Bob's mother came into the kitchen, and she saw that the door of the pie-cupboard, where she keeps the pies, was open. So she went to shut it; and she looked in, and there was Coon, sitting on the top shelf, with a pie in his hands!

When he saw her, he dropped the pie, and it broke all to pieces on the floor, and he jumped right over her head, and ran off as fast as he could run.

And Mrs. Taylor screamed, and Bob came in to see what was the matter, and Coon ran right between his legs and tripped him up, and he fell down on top of the pie.

And then Mrs. Taylor looked at the other pies, and he had patted every one of them all round the edge, and there were the marks of his feet all over them.

There were twelve pies; some of them were squash, and some were custard, and some were cranberry.

She was very angry, and Bob shut up Coon in the wood-closet and came over to tell me about it, and I don't think I ever laughed so much in all my life.

Advice to Farmers.

The fellow who gets off the following thinks himself mighty smart, don't he?

Never give greasy dish-water to pigs; it is too rich for their blood. Feed it to the hired man.

To keep a plow-horse from balking—leave him in the stable and don't try to work him.

The best way to raise potatoes is with a table fork. Some use a case knife; but as its sharp edge is liable to convert a common-sized mouth into an alligator-like abysmal grub-trap, that method should be avoided.

A farm barn should have all the modern improvements. Place a nice roof over it, and put a good fence around it. Then put a big insurance for double its value on it, and some dark and windy night shove a lighted torch under it.

Always postpone threshing until a propitious time. If you've got a grudge against a 200-pound neighbor, wait till some day when he is sick or has his back turned to you. Then jump onto him with a club and thresh the life out of him, if you want to.

Be sure to harvest and sell your eggs before they become over ripe. There is nothing so painful to the average buyer as to open a boiled article of hen fruit at breakfast and find that at some pre-historic period in the halcyon past, it had seen better days. Consumers prefer to meet the egg in the heyday of its existence, and ere it has outlived its usefulness.

Butter must never be trusted to walk alone to the city. It should be muzzled, chained and led by a strong rope, so that it cannot break away and destroy anything. There is an incident on record where a strong, vigorous consignment of extract de cow, en route to market, without a keeper, maliciously stopped on a railroad crossing and threw a train off the track. It cost the farmer owner his whole homestead to pay the damages obtained in court by the railway company.

In conclusion, when coming to the city with your family to visit the "the-ay-ter," instead of lubricating your wagon axles with rancid lard, and putting oil of bergamot on your heads of hair, reverse the order. (Though the odors of the former pale gaslights and suffocate an actor or two still the patrons of the drama in the audience near you will hilariously appreciate the change.

MERRY RIPPLES.

The Onondaga Indians worship a white dog. Their deity must be a holy terrier.

When you see your neighbor in his back yard engaged in splitting wood you may at any moment send a cold chill down his spine by sharply shouting at him, "Look out for that clothes line!"

A San Francisco family recently engaged a young girl from the East who advertised that she had been "four yoars in her last place." The family subsequently learned that she would have remained longer than four years in her last place if the Governor had not pardoned her when he did.

It's mighty seldom dat yer ken tell er pusson 'zactly how yer wants er thing done, an' nine times outen ten it is better for er pusson to do it hisself, fur eben ef it ain' done so well, he is better pleased wid de job. "There!" said Mrs. Gummidge, putting aside her paper. "Good for Lillie Devereux Blake." "What has she done, my dear?" "She says that Shakespeare was a brute, and that the play 'The Taming of the Shrew' does woman gross injustice." "Well, I think myself that it would have been truer to nature if he hadn't a-tamed her."

Fesseden, who recently purchased an alarm clock, says the thing is a confounded humbug. "I set the alarm," he explained, "before going to bed, after taking the precaution to stop the clock, so that its ticking shouldn't keep me awake. And would you believe it, I overslept next morning a whole hour later than usual!"

"Want your sidewalk cleaned off?" he asked of a citizen. "Just got a man." "Have any badges on?" "I believe he has five or six." "Then let him keep the job. I'm a tramp and hard up, but them roller-skating champions has got to earn a living somehow, and I'm not the man to stand in their way. They are entitled to public sympathy and assistance."

It was a New York capitalist who flung $1,000 at one of his sons a year ago and said: "There it is, and it is the last dollar you'll get from me. You don't know enough to pound salt. Speculation! Why you haven't sense eneugh to buy and ship eggs. The other day the old man went down to Florida to see about a 3,000-acre tract of land he had purchased at $3. an acre for an orange grove. He went to the headquarters of "The Florida Orange Grove Estate Agency," and he found that his son was President, Secretary, Treasurer and sole owner. Half an hour later he discovered that his 3,000 acres raised alligators instead of oranges, and that the boy had cleared about $8,000 in the single transaction.

A Toronto drummer succeeded last Fall in taking three or four Ontario customers away from a Montreal house, but when he went his rounds a few days ago he was coldly received and no one would give him an order. "I feel," he finally said, "that I have a right to demand an explanation. How have I forfeited your confidence?" "Oh, you see, I have nothing against you or your house," replied the party addressed, "but the fact is, the other drummer is engaged to one of my daughters, and I feel it my duty to help him all I can." The Toronto man received the same explanation from all the others, and being a married man he abandoned the field.

A Cure For Drunkenness.

The Cure of Drunkenness is a task with which the regular practitioner has been unable to cope. Nine-tenths of mankind look upon drunkenness as a social vice, which a man may overcome by force of will. Drunkenness is a bad habit we all admit, in the moderate drinker. In the confirmed drunkard it becomes disease of the nervous system. The medical treatment of this disease consists in the employment of remedies that act directly upon those portions of the nervous system which, when diseased, cause lunacy, dementia, and the drinking habit. Remedies must be employed that will cure the appetite for strong drink, steady the trembling hand, revive the lagging spirit, balance the mind, etc. The nervous system of the dram drinker being all unstrung or shattered, must be given a nutriment that will take the place of the accustomed liquor, and prevent the physical and moral prostration that often follows a sudden breaking off from the use of alcoholic drinks. Lubon's medicine may be given in tea or coffee, without the knowledge of the person taking it, if so desired. Those of our readers who are interested in this subject, should send their address for Lubon's Treatise, in book form, on drunkenness, opium, morphine and kindred habits, which will be mailed free to any address, when stamp is inclosed for postage. Advice to Young Women.

A lady of intelligence and observation has remarked :

"I wish I could impress upon the minds of the girls that the chief end of woman is not to marry young."

If girls could only be brought to believe that their chances for a happy marriage were better after 25 than before, there would be much less misery in the world than there now is. To be sure, they might not have so many opportunities to marry as before, but as they do not need to marry but one at a time, it is necessary that that one should be satisfactory. As a girl grows older, if she thinks at all, she certainly becomes more capable of judging what would make her happy than when younger. How many girls of 20 would think of marrying the man they would gladly have married at 16?

At 30, a woman who is somewhat independent, and not anxious, over-anxious, to marry, is much harder to please and more careful in her choice than one at 20. There is good reason for this. Her mind has improved with her years, and she now looks beyond mere appearances in judging men. She is apt to ask if this man who is so very polite in company is really kind-hearted. Do his polite actions spring from a happy, genial nature, or is his attractive demeanor put on for the occasion and laid off at home as he lays off his coat?

A very young girl takes it for granted that men are always as she sees them in society—polite, friendly, and on their good behavior. If she marries early the man who happens to please her fancy, she learns to her sorrow that in nine cases out of ten, a man in society and a man at home are widely different beings. Five years, at that period of life, produce a great change in opinions and feelings.

We frequently come to detest at 25 what we admired at 16. We advance from the taffy candy and peanut age to the era of gumdrops and marron glaces, and even in later years lose our yearnings.

His Reward.

Moral lessons are not easy to inculcate and the distressed teacher finds herself between Scylla and Charybdis. A school teacher in California received for a Christmas gift a pair of flower vases, which she kept upon her table. One of the pupils in the school, an over-grown, half-witted youth, was sadly given to telling falsehoods.

As the schoolmistress entered her room one day, she was met by this youth, who was weeping copiously, and holding in his hand the fragments of one of the vases, shattered to atoms. Overwhelmed by the accident, he had shown (for him) remarkable moral courage in "owning up;" and the teacher, delighted at his truthfulness, though deploring the loss of her present, called him a "good boy," and as a reward of honesty, gave him a picture-book.

But the pride she had experienced over his moral improvement was somewhat abated when, the next morning, she met him with the other vase, totally demolished.

"O missus, I've busted your otha liddle jug! Gimme 'notha picture-book!"

His dull mind had conceived the idea that the reward was for breaking the vase, instead of being given to him for telling the truth, in spite of fear.

POOR RELIEF.

[To the Editor of THE EXPRESS.]

SIR,—The report of the meeting to discuss the question of relief for the poor has suggested the idea that perhaps the plan so successfully adopted by the town of Cobourg might work equally well in Napanee. A large and representative committee of ladies of the town have full charge of the work of relief, and to this committee the council give an annual grant. Private contributions are also received, consisting of various articles of food, fuel, clothing, etc. From what I have learned and seen the plan has been economical and quite satisfactory. Should the promoters desire full information I am sure they could obtain it through Mayor C. C. Field, Cobourg.

Yours, &c.,
C. C. JAMES.

The brides were Miss Clara E Armstrong and Miss Josephine Lowry, nieces of Mr. and Mrs. Miller. The ceremony was performed by Rev. James Curts in the presence of about fifty guests, principally relatives of the contracting parties. Mr. W. A. Ford, of Kingston, was united to Miss Armstrong, and Mr. G. S. Briden, of the same place, to Miss Lowry. The occasion was a very happy one indeed and the guests were profuse with congratulations. After the ceremony a recherche repast was partaken of, after which the happy couples started on a tour in the West. The presents to both brides were numerous and valuable. We extend congratulatians and wishes for unlimited happiness.

English, Irish,

Horace S. McCabe, a young man about 17 years of age, hired a rig from Hatch & Burns on Monday morning and drove to Hay Bay, where he pulled up at the residence of Mr. Philip McCabe, his uncle, and asked for a loan of $10, giving as a reason that his mother was ill and he had no money. Mr. McCabe knew the story to be a concocted one, as the lad had been for some time choppingin the woods near Enterprise and had come to town with his wages the Saturday previous. The loan was therefore refused and Mr. Horace then proceeded to Mr. John F. Parks' house, about three quarters of a mile away, where the same request was made, his story this time being that Mr. McCabe, in the absence of his son, had sent him to borrow the money. The youth's word was accepted and the money given. The receiver turned and drove off in the direction of Mr. McCabe's house but was seen repassing the house a very few minutes afterwards. Mr. Parks at once "smelt a mice" as he had not been gone long enough to reach McCabe's house and return. An enquiry revealed the fact that he had been duped, and getting into his cutter he drove to Napanee where he found his deceiver in durance vile, having been captured at the station where he was waiting for the express train, by Mr. Jas Richardson, G. T. R. constable, who arrested him as a suspicious character. Mr. Richardson's attention was attracted to young McCabe by the latter's actions, bobbing around corners and hiding himself wherever possible, as it fearful of being seen. In the police court on Tuesday the prisoner was sent up for trial at the spring assizes. It further appears that on Saturday young McCabe ordered large quantities of groceries, dry goods, jewelry, etc., from a few of our local merchants, ranging in value from $10 to $25, but which he never called for as promised. The young man evidently is not in full possession of his senses, as many of those who knew him at all intimately testified.

—Mr. J. S. Hulett, photographer, has just completed an excellent life-size photo of the late Mr. Wm. Ham, finished in oil and water colors. The likeness is perfect and the picture is finished with a skill and taste that elicits the highest enconiums from all observers. Mr. Hulett also excels in winter scenes, some of his late productions being so natural and true to life that the beholder can scarcely realize that he is gazing upon a picture only. 12

Superb in every Way.

Our prices are as low as are consistent with good workmanship, good material and a reasonable margin.

Examine the good features of these machines before making your selection of a Reaper or Mower.

WE NOW CLAIM

We are manufacturing a lime of implements which, for variety, are unsurpassed by any manufactory of equal capacity in Canada. And we claim our Machines and Implements are FIRST CLASS IN EVERY RESPECT and SECOND TO NONE.

It is a matter of astonishment and admiration to our farmer friends when inspecting our works to see the immense number of machines we are turning out.

THE KEY TO ALL IS THIS: Common sense is showing and experience is teaching the utterly Bad Policy of buying foreign machines, to pay double and treble prices for repairs, to be stopped for days in the midst of harvest when every day or hour represents loss. We are right here on the spot and in case of breakage can give repairs promptly.

Bath.

—Bowen E. Aylsworth, Esq., of Ernesttown, recently sold a pair of Percheron colts, 4 years old, for the magnificent sum of $400. This knocks all other dealers in colts, in this section, "cold."

—Mr. Charles Wemp, a popular young man of our village, is lying dangerously ill at his father's residence. Drs. Kennedy and Price are in close attendance, but not much hope is entertained of his recovery. We do trust, however, that he may be spared to us, as his loss would cast a gloom over the whole neighbourhood. His illness was caused by an accident. One day recently he jumped from the the upper deck of a vessel to the wharf, and received serious internal injuries.

Emerald—Amherst Island.

—Farming operations are progressing favorably.

—Miss Catherine Howard was badly bitten by a dog belonging to Mr. John Morrow. Miss Howard was about to enter Mr. Morrow's house on a friendly call, but his (Mr. Morrow's) dog did not reciprocate the call, and bit Miss Howard's leg so badly that she couldn't walk; She had to be removed to have the wound dressed. The same dog bit a child of Mr. Bobeen a short time previous.

—Mr. Chas. Cummins vacated that desirable store on Main-st., Bath, on May 1st, having occupied it for the past seven years. Any person desirous of entering the mercantile business would do well to communicate with D.J.Campbell, Bath.

—The Methodist quarterly meeting here next Sunday.

—Selby school is doing well. Our schools in Richmond have a splendid supply of teachers this year.

—The showers this week have refreshed matters all over, and vegetation is making rapid progress. The late floods have made havoc in places with the roads and bridges.

—I see in Napanee the famous cartoonist Bengough left his mark behind him. He is a marked man, and will yet succeeded in marking many of the famous and infamous men of our country. His paper, the "Grip," is far wiser than Dicken's raven, and much longer lived. May it live forever.

—Some of our young men are going to the United States. We are annexing this country to the U. S. as fast as possible. Our entire policy is drifting us in that direction. We want more enterprise, more public spirit, more liberality, more intelligence, more taste, more christianity, and not so much politics and whiskey.

—Mr. and Mrs. Rose and son, Alexander, have gone to Ottawa. We sent our compliments by them to the Premier, and that is an augury of his early resignation. We knew that was a canard in the Toronto News as soon as we read it. We said, "No, that is not him, the shot is to big for the bore." We shall have a grander country when something equal to that gets at the helm of affairs.

This is the time for tree planting, except evergreens which should be planted on or about the 1st June. We should have all our schools and churches surrounded with trees. A farm looks much better with a sprinkling of trees all around the fences, than to be utterly destitute. Why not have a premium offered to encourage this work? Let us strive to adorn our farms as well as our towns and cities. The outside of Napanee, on the north especially, would be much improved by planting trees. Were all —James Thompson and wife have moved to Kingston. One of the results of the Scott Act.

—Shields has got in a new brick machine, and the manufacture of brick will at once be commenced. Another result of the Scott Act.

—Mrs. J. Wheeler was brought before Mr. Aylsworth, J. P., by Mr. Wells for destroying fruit trees. She was fined $6 and costs.

—Donaldson Dowling, C. E., and wife spent a few days with Thos. Miller this week. Mr. Dowling left on Tuesday for Ottawa en route for the Rocky Mountains. He goes with the Dominion Geological survey party. Mrs. Dowling will remain in Tamworth during his absence.

Picton.

The annexation of Prince Edward County to Belleville, by means of a bridge across the bay, is having its periodical airing just now. This city seems to have fallen on hard lines lately; finding it difficult, apparently, to maintain a satisfactory dignity on its present resources, anything that could have the slightest appearance of drawing trade to its merchant's counters has always been greedily attempted, though not often with satisfactory results. Covetous glances have ever been cast to the green fields over the water representing the wealth of Ameliasburg's farmers, and it is thought this may be secured to them more surely by means of a bridge than by the present ferry system. By the way, should the floods Belleville is annually subjected to increase, the bridge might be indefinitely extended and used to advantage by its inhabitants during the time of submersion. We certainly have nothing but amicable feelings towards our neighbors, but we do hope it will be a long time before the navigation of our beautiful bay will be interfered with.

That a car coupler, superior to all others on the long list of such inventions, has been patented by a Prince Edward man speaks well for our inventive ability. Mr. Miles Pettit is the name of the fortunate inventor, and Messrs. McMullen and Noxon are placing it on American railway cars. It is claimed to possess all the points required in this most necessary contrivance without the objectionable features of those hitherto in use.

For several weeks past the question of lighting our town by electric light has been the subject of consideration. Very nearly the required number of subscribers have been obtained to warrant the company in proceeding, and it is only reasonable to hope before long it will become an accomplished fact. It will certainly be a leap, from coal oil lamps to electricity, but we hope to be able to take it with no bad results.

Our Methodist ministers are busily enethereal that the naked eye fails to catch the depth and harmony of color so artistically blended into one superb hue. There is only one little fault to be found with this picture. The artist in the fervid intensity of her desire to do justice to the original has in some places applied the match too freely, consequently there is a slight intermingling of colors, while several miniature rivulets of variegated hues meander carelessly over the canvas,—we mean the pasteboard,—thus giving it a slight resemblance to the appearance of a flour barrel after the rats had been playing hide-and-seek in it during the calm hour of midnight, when everything was hushed and silent except the cats of the neighborhood who were holding one of their ghostly seances on the other side of the fence, just out of the reach of bricks and old boots. But we are wandering. Back, then, to the subject from which we have digressed. The painting must be seen in order to be able to fully drink in its beauty and magnificence. The work was done by a lady (married, too) living a few miles from town, and we understand she intends opening up classes for instruction in painting. Terms moderate. An effort is to be made to have them placed in the art gallery at our next county show. The idea is a good one, and should carry. Anyway, don't fail to call at the earliest opportunity and inspect and admire these works of art.

Navigation Notes.

—A small vessel with timber for Rathbun & Co. entered the harbor Tuesday and cleared on Thursday with a load of coal screenings.

—The Gipsy, we understand, is allowed to carry 300 passengers this year. This is in advance of the number allowed her last season.

—The Reindeer is kept busy between hours towing vessels clear of the river. She has a monopoly of the business. The Reindeer always makes close connections.

—The schooner Fabiola came up the river Saturday with a load of coal for Rathbun & Co. She cleared the following Wednesday with barley shipped by C. E. Bartlett.

—The Montreal Witness announces that the S. S. "Dominion," of the Dominion line, was the first boat into the harbor from sea this season. She left Bristol on April 17th and arrived here on the 30th.

—The Reindeer was in Picton Monday to undergo an inspection. The inspector found that there were not enough mud ports in her boiler and accordingly she was laid over for a day or two to have the necessary repairs made. She has resumed her route.

—Some complaints having been made by the captains of vessels running into Napanee harbor relative to the absence of buoys from the river, which are greatly needed at this time of the year when the water is high, the Fire, Water and Gas Committee have been instructed to have the same laid down at once.

C. P. R. Exhibition Car.

around the fences, than to be utterly destitute. Why not have a premium offered to encourage this work? Let us strive to adorn our farms as well as our towns and cities. The outside of Napanee, on the north especially, would be much improved by planting trees. Were all sections to do this our roads would not be so blocked in the winter, and the country would be more lovely in summer.

Mill Haven.

—Not having heard from the Mill Haven correspondent for some time I thought I would give you a few items of interest.

—Miss Kate Benjamin, of Cheboygan, Mich., is visiting friends here.

—Mr. William J. Armstrong is able to walk out again after a severe illness.

—Robert Finigan has opened up a grocery store here and is doing a good business.

—Making flower gardens and beautifying yards is the order of the day at present.

—Mr. Fairfield talks of building a new mill, but I am airaid it will end in talk.

—Mr. Pledger has moved away from Mill Haven and the house on the Fairfield farm is vacant.

—Mr. Sterling has rented the Louis Hartman farm and moved into the house. Mr. Hartman has moved to Portsmouth to keep bach.

—John Fleming has been confined to the house with a thesalow, but we are glad to see him around again attending to his business in the shop.

—The dwelling house and contents of Mr. Isaac Sterling were consumed by fire last week. Cause of fire unknown. Loss $1,000; insured in the Watertown for $700.

Odessa.

—Scott vs. Mabee, assault, before A. Storms, J.P.: $4 and costs.

—A robbery case is reported from the West End, N. F. Snider, L.D.S., having been victimized.

—A special meeting of the council was held on the 3rd inst., in reference to bridges lately damaged.

—The funeral of the late Mrs. Harry Benjamin (nee Moore) passed through en route to Morven cemetery.

—Legee Duffin, our enterprising barber, has removed to more spacious quarters—second door east af previous stand.

—N. Sharp, in turning, upset his wagon and contents on the street. Mr. Sharp, we are pleased to say, escaped unhurt.

—Dennis Wright. R.E., is having a portion of our board walk re laid, Messrs. Kenny and Stitt doing the work in good shape.

—Quarterly service will be held in the East End Methodist Church at 10 o'clock next Sunday morning. Invitation extended to all.

—Sheldon Hawley has been laid up, having met with a slight accident by too familiar contact with the big circular saw in the mill. Nothing daunted the saw is having another "round."

—The dying kick of the "crater" expended itself in the shape of a bon-fire on the 30th ult., and the hotel keepers have taken a commendable course in running their hotels with the usual good accommodation, with the exception of the prohibited articles.

—A number of kind-hearted farmers very generously left their own pressing work to help a brother through, making a bee and doing considerable of Harvey Denyes' seeding, who, we are sorry to note, has been confined to the house seriously ill. Bravo lads!

—Before magistrates Davy and Clark, Etta Young, seventeen years old. pled guilty to a charge of prostitution, and was sentenced to four months in the county jail. One sensational evidence was taken, in which the names of several of our village gents (?) figured prominently. Magistrate Clark talked to her like a Dutch father, sympathetic words failing to bring before long it will become an accomplished fact. It will certainly be a leap, from coal oil lamps to electricity, but we hope to be able to take it with no bad results.

Our Methodist ministers are busily engaged perfecting arrangements for the conference of that denomination which meets here early in June. The entertaining of 300 lay and clerical delegates will exercise the hospitality of our little town, but it will without doubt prove equal to the occasion.

With the majority of our citizens the great and absorbing questions of the day have vanished out of sight, while the intensely, ever-occuring process of house-cleaning occupies the place of consideration instead, and claims the individual attention of every member ot the household. The Times man says this simple announcement is enough to explain the worn and tired look of the men you meet, but we think he is a little mistaken this time. He must be thinking of his male friends living in some other locality, for really the gentlemen here seem to enjoy the annual spring turn out quite as much as their lady friends. In fact we have heard several remark that they doated on picnicing in the wood shed and bivouacing on the front stairs. Certainly the echo of well-directed blows on waving carpets proves them to be men of muscle, as well as men ot mind, and perhaps explains their amiability. GAFFER GREEN.

"THEM PICTERS."

Mr. T. A. Huffman has on exhibition in his office two or three wonderful productions of paint and brush. A great many people have called during the week to inspect them, and all are loud in their praises of the genius of the artist. Our art critic is on the sick list this week, (he drove a tack in his thumb while nailing down his mother-in-law's carpet), and we are therefore obliged to dispense with his services and perform the delicate task of criticizing the aforesaid "picters" ourselves. We hope our readers will pardon us if they notice any slight inaccuracies in our use of art parlance. In the first place the pictures are too small for general use. They were evidently not intended to be hung up in any common room, being of slight, aristocratic build—probably intended for the White House or Westminster. The finest one of the group is undoubtedly the "Sun set," but its glaring brilliancy is so dazzling that one generally prefers a rear view—it is less hurtful to the eyes. This excellent representation of old Sol's transcendent effulgence is painted (in water colors, we presume) on a pear-shaped piece of pasteboard which probably had seen active service as the side of a taffy box. The colors—well, here we are all at fault. Our pen is dumb, yea, thrice dumb, for want of words to describe the exquisite pathos and wildly bewitching charm of that conglomeration of colors. It must be seen to be appreciated. No. 2 shows a sectional view of a house—at least, we suppose it's a house. Now, this house is a very peculiar one. It somewhat resembles the leaning tower of Pisa in its astonishing disregard for perpendicularity, while its whole build shows an utter lack of ability on the part of the contractor. But the artist very generously overlooked many little irregularities which might tend to detract from the contractor's reputation as a master-builder, and consequently, though the structure is not a model residence by any means, its condition is greatly improved. The last, but not least, is supposed to represent a beautiful exotic of most delicate construction. And it conveys the idea intended--if you look at it in the right light. A sort of bird's-eye view from the distance "lends enchantment to the scene," as it were. The artist says it is an admirable portrait indeed, and we are prepared to accept the statement unequivocally. In fact the flower is so fragile and high, the Fire, Water and Gas Committee have been instructed to have the same laid down at once.

C. P. R. Exhibition Car.

The C. P. R. Co'y have fitted up a car containing exhibits from Manitoba, and are sending it for free exhibition all through Canada. The car was at Napanee from Friday until Saturday morning last and was visited by hundreds. It is built after the design of the Pullmans, the exhibits being arranged on stands on either side, while the roof is literally thatched with grain and grasses. Among the grains we noticed samples of No. 1 hard red fyfe wheat, weighing 66 lbs. to the bushel; white fyfe, white potato oats, weighing 48 lbs. to the bushel; two and six row barley weighing 55½ lbs. to the bushel, also black, white and brown hulless barley averaging 60lbs. to the bushel. These samples were enough to gladden the heart of any Canadian, to think that we had a country capable of producing such grain. Then there were peas both white and black, and flax seed with various articles manufactured from it, including linseed oil and oil cake. This oil cake is used very extensively for fattening cattle in the North West, and the manufacture ot it has recently been been added to the list of industries in Winnipeg. Among the samples of flax seed shown us was one grown on the farm of Mr. Donald Fraser, formerly of Ernesttown A head of oats 24½ inches long was shown us, and a stool showing 6,000 grains as the result from one grain. Fifty-three varieties of native grass were shown, varying in length from 9 inches to 9 feet 4 inches, all but two being nutritious. A great variety ot vegetables were exhibited, including twenty different kinds of potatoes. Any one of the potatoes shown would make a good meal for a family of five. Cultivated and wild fruits of an extraordinary size; coal from the Galt mines near Fort McLeod; copper ore from the Bow river; free stone from Calgarry, and many other exhibits convince us that there is a yet great future for the North-West. The Co. have shown commendable enterprise in thus advertising Western Canada. Over 600 bush. ot seed grain have already been given away at the car. Parties who had not an opportunity of visiting the car, can see samples of the wheat and oats by calling at THE EXPRESS office.

The mayor and council of Napanee, in a body, were shown tarough the car by Mr. Bailey on Friday. The councillors speak highly of Mr. Bailey's courtesy and affability.

A High Compliment.

The Montreal Star (Ind.) says;—A Great compliment was paid to Mr. S. H. Blake, Q. C., the other day. He was counsel for the defence in the libel case of ex-Mayor Dunnet, of Belleville, against the vestry of Christ church at Belleville, the suit arising out of a circular issued by the vestry touching upon the character of the plaintiff, and the matter has been referred to Mr. Blake for judgment, both parties agreeing to abide by this decision. It is not unusual to compromise such cases by the abritration of third parties, but it is very unusual to refer the matter to the counsel for defence. It is an acknowledgment of Mr. Blake's reputation for fairness and intergrity.

The discovery of the instantaneous process of taking photographs has been quickly followed in the medical world by a perfect and instantaneous remedy for all acute aches and pains, as neuralgia, toothache, rheumatism, etc. This valuable remedy is called Fluid Lightning, and is sold at 25 cents a bottle at Grange's or Huffman's drug store, Napanee, and at Jas. Aylsworth's, Tamworth.

One Dollar Against Five Hundred.

Isaac Brown, of Bothwell, Ont., was afflicted with chronic humor in the blood. He says one dollar bottle of Burdock Blood Bitters was worth more than $500.00 paid for other medicines. It is a reliable blood purifier.

THE FARM.

Plowing.

Farmers, as a general rule, says one of them in a recent letter, do not take pains enough with this part of their farm work. I am convinced that I can get more clear cash from an acre that is well plowed than I can from an acre that is only half plowed. What I mean by half plowed is where it is plowed by guess, deep here and shallow there, wide furrow here and a narrow one there, with the furrows standing on edge or turned over very flat. We can do good plowing just as easily and just as fast as we can hog it over.

The first thing in good plowing is to commence right. In marking out a bed I use two stakes, one at the opposite end of the field from which I begin to plow and the other about eight rods from this toward the end where I begin. Get the stakes in line with the furrow where you start, and then take some object away beyond the first stake you set in exact line with the stakes and furrow where you begin, and then go ahead with the plow until you come to the first stake. Step and take the stake down and lay it to one side out of the way, and then go ahead again, taking the end stake and the object beyond for your guide. In plowing the first two times around set your plow-wheel so as not to plow more than 4½ inches deep. After you have gone thus far raise your wheel so as to plow the depth you wish to have your plowing done. By doing as I have described we avoid the high back furrow we would have if we plowed the first two times around as deep as we do the rest of the bed.

In plowing the first two furrows (the first time around) we have two essential things to look after. First, to do our plowing straight; second, to turn the furrows over in good shape, and have the edges of the furrows meet and set firmly together. This will prevent the grass from growing up between the furrows to a great extent. Now we can go ahead and finish up our bed. Be sure to keep the furrows straght and the same width the entire length of the field. If you hold your plow firm and steady your furrows will be as straight as a line. Keep your beds the same width at both ends of the field, and then when we come to finish we have only one furrow the entire length of the field to turn out. This, I think, is much better than to have one end finished and from one to five furrows on the other end to turn out yet. Right here I would like to say a word which I consider very important in doing a good job of plowing. It is this: I consider it very essential that the driver and team understand each other pretty well. If you have a good, strong, well-kept team, and one that is steady and true to pull, I see no reason why we can't do our plowing in a workmanlike manner.

Sowing Grass Seed.

The amount of seed required for an acre of ground intended for grass cannot be properly estimated, although most farmers sow a given quantity every year without giving proper consideration to the quality of the seeds or the condition of the soil. The soil may be in excellent condition to-day for seed, but may require double the quantity of seeds in two or three days after. In the first place, seed will not germinate unless the proper conditions are favorable for so doing. When the ground is hard, as is sometimes the case when grass seed is sown upon growing grain, there are a great many chances against the seed. Birds eat much of it, while a large portion of it rots on the surface. In such cases a large quantity of seed is necessary. Many of the poor "catches" of clover are due to not using

HERE AND THERE.

Esther Dow, of Deerfield, N. H., who recently died, aged 88 years, had never in her life seen a railway train, and for years had not been off her farm.

Daniel Arnold, of Macon, Ga., hid his savings ($700) in a hole near his house, but the recent flood inundated the hole and carried away Dan's wealth.

A remarkable bedstead, made to order by a Milwaukee furniture firm, is 24 feet wide and has nine compartments, each intended to hold one of the purchaser's children.

One of the barbers who was arrested in Washington the other day for keeping his shop open on Sunday had employed a part of the day of rest in shaving President Cleveland.

Sam Small has given $140 for the benefit of an Atlanta, Ga., mission Sunday-school. He writes:—"I hope it will do away with the necessity of an entertainment, for I do not believe these means of getting money for the Lord's work, are to either His honour or glory. Try to avoid all such schemes. Let people give what they will, but please don't barter them anything for the Lord's sake."

A Texas jeweller hung a watch in his window and labelled it: "Look at this watch for $10," and the unsophisticated gentleman from a neighboring county who stared at the article and then went in and wanted the $10 had to get down on the floor with the jeweller and roll over and under him a number of times before he could be made to understand that he couldn't have any $10.

Thunder from a clear sky could hardly have more surprised the passengers in a street car recently than the sudden exclamation made by a 3-year-old child, of remarkably beautiful face and form. It had been lying half asleep in its mother's arms, and had been awakened, when it straightened up and cried, loud enough to be heard from one end of the car to the other, "Ma, if you don't let me alone I'll break your nose."

A Maine fisherman, who used to sail the Southern seas, reports that he saw a sea serpent the other day off Wells. It was like one he once saw in the Caribbean Sea, except that it has grown considerably. It held its head, the size of a barrel, high in the air; its eyes, as big as saucers, gleamed with a marvelous light, and its huge open mouth was armed with triple rows of teeth. The paper that reports this says the old salt is not addicted to drink.

A recent study of comparative heights and weights among different classes of population in Great Britain shows that the criminal class average no less than 45 pounds in weight, and 4½ inches in height less than their antagonists, the Metropolitan police. Compared with the general population, too, this class is seen to be 18 pounds in weight and 2 inches in stature below the average, standing on about the same plane in physical endowments as lunatics.

A goose which has just died at Stuttgart left the flock while still a gosling, and resolved to have nothing more to do with its companion geese, but to try a new way of life for itself. So it boldly marched into the barracks of a Uhlan regiment one day and stationed itself near the sentry box. The Uhlans were touched by the goose choosing to ally itself with their corps and built a shed for it to live in. For twenty-three years neither threats nor persuasion were able to separate this bird from its adopted regiment. When the corps changed quarters the goose went with them, and when the Uhlans went to fight for their country the desolate creachances against the seed. Birds eat much of it, while a large portion of it rots on the surface. In such cases a large quantity of seed is necessary. Many of the poor "catches" of clover are due to not using care in seeding. A light harrow passed over the field immediately after the seeding, if the ground is hard, will not only cover the seed, but greatly benefit the grain crop. When grain is sown in the spring the grass seed should be sown at the same time, in order that both may have the advantage of thorough preparation of the soil, and less seed will then be required. Even a "brushing" of the field after sowing grass seed is better than simply scattering it on the surface. It is not too late for seed yet, nor should the opportunities be thrown away of taking advantage of the spring rains. In sowing seed do not trust entirely to the roller, and there will be a better chance of the seed germinating.

SPRING SPARKLES.

"Did you ever see anything like this?" said a young lady at a church fair, when raffling was in progress. "Only once," replied he. "When was that, dear?" "Once on a train out West, when it was robbed by bandits," was the gentle response.

One little girl was heard to say to a playmate: "When I grow up I'm going to be a school-teacher." "Well, I'm going to be a mamma, and have six children." "When they come to school to me I'm going to whip 'em," "You mean thing! What have they ever done to you?"

"We feel," writes a Western editor, "that an apology is due to Widow Grimes. In our issue of last week we stated that she had eloped with an 18-year-old man. The truth is that she was thrown from an 8-year-old mare, which she was riding in a lope, and which slipped and fell. Mistakes will happen in the best-regulated newspaper-offices, and we are confident that when we state the item was sent over a telephone-wire no other apology will be needed."

It is said to be Japanese etiquette for a gentleman caller never to leave the house of a lady friend until she has given him the signal for departure. There are a great many young men in this country who never leave the house of a lady friend until she gives the signal, but it is not etiquette. And it is not healthy, either. It deprives both parties of too much sleep. Sometimes the signal is so long delayed that the old folks are compelled to give it. And that is not very healthy either—especially for the young man.

Two newly-fledged physicians met the other day, and the following highly interesting conversation ensued; "Ah! good morning, doctor." "Good morning, doctor." "And how are you to-day, doctor?" "I'm all right. Got a good case of meningitis at your hospital, doctor?" "Yes; come down and take a look at it, doctor. Anything special up your way, doctor?" "Man fell from scaffolding and broke his neck two days ago; still alive; may get over it. Please to have you call, doctor." "Thank you; I will, doctor. Good-day, doctor." "Good-day, doctor."

Mrs. Prudence Crandall Philleg, now living in a "three-room pioneer box house" at Elk Falls, Kan., who has just been compensated by the Connecticut Assembly with an annuity of $400 for outrages sustained 53 years ago when she was driven out of a Connecticut town for keeping a school for nergo girls, has written a grateful letter of thanks for the relief at last afforded. She is under especial obligations to the press and to progressive persons who petitioned in her behalf as well as to the Legislature, and notes the change in Connecticut sentiment as follows: "In 1833, when the law was passed by which my life prospects were destroyed it was celebrated by ringing the bell hung in the steeple of the church, into which we were not allowed to enter, and by firing a cannon thirteen times, placed upon an eminence a few rods from my door; and to-day when your telegram arrived, the only jubilant display I wished to make was to have a private nook where my tears of joy and gratitude could flow unobserved for the change that has been wrought in the views and feelings of the mass of the people.

The following story is told of an enterprising Toronto jobber, the events having taken place some time ago: The merchant in question, having heard of the arrival of a country trader who was know to be a large purchaser and of unquestionable credit, was resolved to get him to visit his establishment, and once there, he felt sure he could secure him as a customer. He accordingly sent out one of his drummers, of whom he had quite a number, adapted to every taste and disposition. The one sent, however, returned without success. No. 2 was dispatched, with no better result, and again No. 3, and so on until all had gone and come back without their man. The merchant now determined to go himself, and finding that brandy and water and free tickets to the theater were of no avail, for the country trader did not take one or go to the other, he was reduced to the necessity of employing a ruse, which, as the sequel shows, was simple as well as effectual. On taking his departure after a pleasant interview the merchant took care to commit the "mistake" of taking the trader's hat instead of his own. Next morning, as was expected, the merchant received a prompt visit at his store from the trader, who came to look up the hat which he supposed had been hurriedly exchanged. This was what the merchant wanted, and through this means he sold a good bill of goods and secured a regular customer.

Royalists Learning to Labor.

Prince Ludwig, of Battenberg, who, like the Russian princes, has been taught a handicraft, was lately initiated into the mysteries of printing. Having mastered the business he taught it to his wife, and the princely pair have just set up in type and printed a book of 200 pages, entitled "My Journey to Bulgaria." The author of this little volume, which is intended only for private circulation, is the Countess Maria, of Erbach, Schoenberg, Prince Alexander's sister. The Knights of Labor would hardly approve of Prince and Princess Ludwig's competition, but they could find little fault with their printing.

Caged Fires.

The fate of the Oregon has shown the danger to be dreaded from water, and the more fortunate experience of the steamer Crystal only two months ago, suggests the peril in which a vessel may be placed by fire. In the case of the Crystal the bulkheads were undoubtedly of great assistance.

On January 11 John Gray, the steward, thought he could feel unusual heat in his room. He waited until 8 o'clock, and then went into the chief officer's room to report his suspicions. When he opened the stateroom door he was met by a dense cloud of smoke, and with difficulty aroused the mate. A volume of smoke was pouring in at a small hole bored through the bulkhead to allow a telegraph wire to run from the forward steering wheel to the after one, and it was four hours before the mate was returned to consciousness. The second officer, whose room was abaft the mate's with a similar aperture in the bulkhead, was also unconscious. The vessel was then 700 miles east of Newfoundland.

When the full extent of the danger was made known to Captain Stannard, he at once ordered all the openings described to be closed up and the hatches battened down. The ship is divided into four water-tight compartments, with iron bulkheads seperating them. That one where the fire was located was about forty feet long, and reached from the upper deck to the keelson. There were stowed bales of jute, carpets, paper stock and burlap, and Captain Stannard rightly concluded it to be useless to attempt to distinguish the fire with water. The smoke from the smoldering mass permeated every corner of the vessel and made it impossible for the men to remain below decks. Several of them were prostrated during the passage and had to be cared for in the engine room.

A consultation of the officers was held, and all but the coptain thought it advisable to make for St. John's or Halifax. Some dissatisfaction was expressed when Captain Stannard made up his mind that he would bring the vessel to New York.

The succeeding ten days and nights were filled with apprehension. The decks are of iron covered with wood, and it was feared that before reaching port the heat would force its way upward to the deck and give vent to the smoldering flames. Both fore and aft bulkheads of the conpartment containing the fire, it was feared, would give way, and then the flames would have a clean sweep fore and aft. But with a steady courage and admirable coolness the captain continued on his course and quieted the fear of his crew.

"I have been at sea many years and have suffered shipwreck," he said, "but never was I placed in so terrible a position as on this passage. Sailors can fight all the elements except fire. In a gale of wind, so occupied are the crew with their duties that they have but little time to think of danger, but in this case all know their fearful peril."

The consignees are much pleased with the manner in which Captain Stannard acted, and say that to his determination is due the safe arrival of the ship. The damage to the cargo is said to be in the neighborhood of $10,000, mostly covered by insurance where it appears some fears were entertained of the safety of the cutter Alice Grey. The Alice Grey left Brisbane for McArthur river, in the northern territory. She was seen between Kimberly and Swear Island, after which nothing was heard of her. Whilst making inquiries to the fate of the vessel, the master of the schooner Pelton learned that the natives of the territory between the McArthur and Robinson rivers had murdered two white men. After killing the two men the natives were reported to have roast d the bedies and then feasted on them It was supposed that the unfortunate men belonged to the crew of the Alice Grey; but before the report had reached Brisbane a dispatch was received from the Government Agent at Normington reporting the arrival of the Alice Grey. The two men were then thought to belong to another trading vessel.

Mrs, Snugmuch (who is the first guest to arrive) to her hostess—"And so you expect Mrs. Dash? Fine woman, very fine woman; though, between ourselves, a trifle loud. And, really, she shouldn't go on as she does with young Mr. Milds. And he's coming, too? Nice fellow, extremely nice fellow, if he does make me think of a monkey every time I look at him. And Miss Jolie? Lovely girl! Pity she's so very plain and unpleasantly rude. And Ritewell, the auther? Clever man, but horribly conceited. And Mrs. Wood? Ah, there's a charming old lady! I admire her so much for this reason: You never hear her say a word against anybody."

An old member of the medical profession tells us a story which, he says, Dr. J. Adams Allen, told him many years ago. Dr. Allen, as the story goes, was just beginning his practice when, one Winter day, seated in a car, muffled to the ears, he overheard this conversation between two passengers who were sitting where they could not see his face. "Say, George," said one, "what kind of a doctor is this young Allen?" "All that I know about him is that he snatched my aunt from the grave last Summer—that is, I shall always think he did." "Did he, indeed?" said the other; "well, he must be a pretty good doctor then. What was the matter with your aunt!" "Oh, she was dead and buried, you know."

A curious old custom among the quarry men of the Isle of Purbeck was observed recently at Corfe Castle. There is among the quarrymen a charter bearing the date of 1551, which is rigorously obeyed, in order to keep the working of the stone quarries in the Isle of Purbeck, in the hands of the freemen. To be able to take up one's freedom one must be the legitimate son of a freeman. He must be 21 years of age, up to which time his wages belong to his parents. Once during the year the quarrymen meet at Corfe Castle town hall and there read the charter, and on that occasion—namely, Shrove Tuesday—"free boys' claim and take up their freedom. Each man has to sign the roll of freeman, pay a fee of six shillings and eight pence, provide a penny loaf made on purpose by the baker of the of the place and to buy a pot of beer. The man thus sworn in becomes his own master. Should any of the freemen desire to marry during the next year, he has to pay to the stewards "a marriage shilling," and should he neglect to do this his wife loses all interest in the quarry and cannot take an apprentice to work for her.

of the purest Virginia. But if they want to know what this "purest Virginia" is, they should read what a large manufacturer of tobacco recently said to a New York reporter. "The quantity of drugs used in cigarettes is appalling," he declared, "and the commonest of these is valerian and tincture of opium.

"An experienced tobacconist can detect the presence of valerian by the smell The drug imparts a sweet, soothing effect, that in a little time obtains a fascinating control over the smoker. The more cigarettes he smokes, the more he desires to smoke, just as is the case with one who uses opium. The desire grows into passion. The smoker becomes a slave to the enervating habit.

"By the use of drugs it is possible to make a very inferior quality of tobacco pleasant. They are put on the market at such a price that the poorest can easily procure them, and boys go in swarms for them."

"That is this Havana flavoring that is so much used?"

"It is made from the tonca bean, which contains a drug called mellolotis, a deadly poison, seven grains being sufficient to kill a dog. It has become quite an article of commerce, and is extensively used in the manufacture of cigarettes."

"Does the paper wrapper of a cigarette add a great deal to its injuriousness?"

"Certainly. There are three sorts of paper in common use, made respectively from cotton, from linen rags and from rice straw. Cotton-paper is made chiefly in Trieste, Austria, and the linen and rice-paper in Paris.

"The first, manufactured from the filthy scrapings of ragpickers, is bought in large quantities by the manufacturers, who turn it into a pulp, and subject it to a bleaching process to make it presentable.

"The lime and other substances used in bleaching have a very harmful influence upon the membrane of the throat and nose.

"Cotton-paper is so cheap that a thousand cigarettes can be wrapped at cost of only two cents. Rice paper is rather expensive. Tobacconized paper is manufactured.

"It is the common paper saturated with tobacco in such a way as to imitate the veins of the tobacco leaf very neatly. It is used in making all-tobacco cigarettes. Arsenical preparations are also used in bleaching cigarette-papers, and oil of creosote is produced naturally as a consequence of combustion. The latter is very injurious to the throat and lungs, and is said to accelerate the development of consumption in any one predisposed to the disease."

Doctor—"You need more sleep, my friend; that is the whole trouble with you; what is your business?" Patient—"I'm a policeman." Doctor—"Then it must be something else, but I surely thought it was loss of sleep. After all, perhaps you don't take enough exercise."

A reporter called on an officer's wife to know the whereabout of her husband, who was on a certain committee: "Is Mr. Blank attending a meeting this evening?" asked the reporter. "No, sir. He went to the meeting, but an hour since he came back and said the committee had adjourned sine qua non, and said he was going down-town. You'll find him at one of the hotels."

YOUNG FOLKS.

"CHIP."

"Cheep! cheep!" Where did it come from—that plaintive little cry?

John heard it in the conservatory, and going out into the garden found a wee baby-bird, evidently too young to fly, and much frightened at being left alone.

Kind-hearted John gathered the fluttering creature up in his hands, and carrying it into the warm conservatory set it gently down under a fragrant lemon tree. Then, finding some cracker-crumbs in his pocket, he soaked them in the watering-can, and strewed them before the birdling, which was at first too frightened to touch them, but as John quietly resumed his work at a little distance at length began to feel more confidence, and soon was busily picking up the crumbs with contented little chirps.

It had such a wide-awake, self-satisfied air as it grew comfortable and more at home, smoothing its wisps of feathers in such comical imitation of bigger birds, that John's honest heart warmed toward the little thing, and soon boy and bird became the best of friends. He called it "Chip," and never tried to cage it, but gave it the whole conservatory for a play-ground, with which arrangement the little guest seemed perfectly satisfied, never trying to escape, even when the windows were open, probably not knowing the difference between clear space and transparent glass.

After the first day Chip never showed the slightest fear of John, alighting on his shoulder with perfect confidence, and after a little even taking food from his lips. As time passed he learned many cunning tricks; as, for instance, when John would say sternly, "Naughty Chip!" he would droop his little head as if ashamed, and when he cried, pleasantly, "Good Chip!" "Pretty Chip!" would raise it again with a merry "Peep!"

He had too, a cunning way of playing hide-and seek with John. Placing himself under the drooping leaf of a calla, or palm, he would keep very still, while John hunted up and down the terraces of plants, calling "Chip! Chip!" till at last with a queer little chuckling noise, he would hop into sight as delighted as a child. The people who employed John often brought visitors into the conservatory, and all admired his pretty pet.

Once, a gentleman, whose only son was a little cripple, saw the cunning bird, and, thinking it would amuse his poor child, asked John what he would take for it.

"I'm sure I don't know, sir," he answered, modestly. "I never thought of selling Chip, and I'm afraid he wouldn't be so playful anywhere else. You see he's used to me, and knows I never hurt him in my life—that's why he's so tame."

"Yes," said the gentleman, looking thoughtfully at John, "I see—unvarying kindness will tame almost anything. But will you let me take him home and try? I don't live far away, and if Chip will do as he does here I'll give you thirty dollars for him."

This seemed a great sum to John, who was poor, so he reluctantly consented, and, for the first time putting Chip in a cage, let the gentleman take him away; but when released in the cripple's beautiful room, though there were almost as many plants as he had been used to, poor Chip only flew about with sharp cries of fright till quite tired out, then hid himself under a begonia leaf, where he sat in sulky silence, refusing to eat, and pecking at every hand that came near him

The next morning the gentleman went after John.

ANECDOTES OF GREAT MEN.

BY THE REV. W. S. BLACKSTOCK.

Thomas Carlyle is another of those characters of whom it is not easy to make fine gentlemen. He had more irritability, though perhaps less ferocity, than Johnson; and, in some of his moods, was, I suspect, not an altogether amiable companion. The dyspeptic stomach, no doubt, was responsible for much of his irascibility. But without that disordered part of his internal economy, against which he enveighed so bitterly, he would not have been the unique figure in literary history that he really is. If it be true that even in things evil there is a soul good, it is not improbable that even to this diseased organ which inflicted so much torture upon its unfortunate possessor, the readers of his works are indebted for a good deal of their edge, and point, and firey energy. A man who is habitually in the condition of one who has breakfasted or dined upon pen-knives or razors, especially with the brain of such a one as Thomas Carlyle, whether he pay very minute attention to the graces of style or not, is sure to say sharp things at least.

And this, by the way, raises an interesting physiologico-psychological question: this, namely, whether a diseased gastric apparatus is not a positive advantage, if not a necessity, to men, like Thomas Carlyle, who deem it their special mission into the world to detect and expose cheats and shams. This, we know, Sidney Smith regarded as his special function; but, though he succeeded after a fashion, no one can tell how much more effectively he might have fulfilled his mission, if instead of being a bon vivant, he had been condemned to lenten fare perpetually, by a chronically disordered stomach. Whether it would have given him greater clearness of vision, and enabled him to discern more clearly between the evil and the good or not, it would doubtless have enabled him to apply the knout with more stinging effect to the back of unfortunate transgressors.

Poor Tom! He appeared upon this planet as one born out of due time. Whether he knew the people of his own generation or not, it is evident that they did not know him. I suspect, indeed, that they were much more at a loss to understand him than he was to understand them. Nothing is more amusing than the attempts of some of his liliputian critics to assign him his proper place among men. One of them, writing in a first-class American newspaper, thirty years ago, alluding to the complaint of some one else that he was neither a Christian nor a gentleman, said, he made no pretention to being either the one or the other of these, but simply a heathen and a devil-worshipper!

And yet, Thomas Carlyle was not only the greatest Scotchman probably that has hitherto appeared, but one of the most highly gifted beings that trod the earth during his lifetime. The last of the Cynics, he was a worthy successor to Diogenes. With an eye quick to detect genuine manhood, whenever it might be found, he could not be induced to accept every "forked radish with a curiously curved head however fastidiously and elaborately clothed," as a fitting representative of the genus homo. He had a profounder insight of the "science of clothes," and of the religion of the "Dandaical Sect" than any of his contemporaries; and, should the race survive for any considerable length of time, and its pregress should be upward, the probability is, that "Sartor Resartus" will be read with more thorough appreciation in the wiser ages to come than it is at present.

correctness, that, "upon the whole, a truer, more right-hearted Englishman never existed." "Wherever you see a line of his own writing, you may be sure to find nothing but truth there." Then, speaking of the wretched mistakes which different ages make concerning their greatest, he said: "Why the Jews took Jesus for a scoundrel, and thought all that they could do with Him was to nail Him up on a gallows. Ah, that was bad business; so He returned to Heaven, and they go wandering about the streets buying old clothes."

This was in 1844. In 1846 Caroline Fox visited Carlyle, and found him thin but well, and recovering from the torment of the sixty new Cromwell letters; and with a grim determination to not take in any more fresh ones on any terms. But evidently he was possessed of the spirit of his subject. And we are not surprised to find that the year following he was not writing, but resting, reading English history, and disagreeing with the age. Blessings on him! I have great respect for a man who, when he forms his opinions as the result of large reading, careful study, and profound thought, dares to differ from the age. It is easy to swim with the current, and to run with the multitude; it is easy to re-echo the sentiments of the chattering crowd, and to conciliate those whom we flatter, but the multitude—not over wise at any time—need to be instructed as well as flattered; and when a real man appears on the scene, if he is true to his mission, he will find more serious work to do than offering incense to the multitude, or singing peans to the age.

The Most Northerly Railway in the World.

In the report of Consul General Mitchell on the trade of Norway, it is stated that the Ofoten-Lulea Railway, which will, when completed, greatly influence the future of the iron trade of Europe, was commenced last summer at Lulea, on the Gulf of Bosnia, and has made very considerable progress. The contractors confidently expect to have the first section, Lulea-Gellivara (one-third of the entire railway), completed and opened for traffic by the end of 1886. The commencement of work at the Norwegian terminus has been delayed a year, in consequence of a disagreement as to the site of the terminus at Ofoten, necessitating fresh surveys being made. These have now been completed, and the plans, etc., of the Norwegian portion of the line deposited with the Norwegian Government, upon the approval of which work at Ofoten will be commenced. The site chosen for the terminus at Ofoten is on the west shore of Narvig Bay, a commodious and well-sheltered natural harbor at the bottom of the Ofoten fjord and within a few hours steam of the famous Lofoten cod fisheries. On account of the influences of the gulf stream, the Ofoten ford is navigable throughout the year. The length of the Norwegian section of the line is only 28 miles. It will cross the Kolen Mountains, at the frontier at an elevation of 1,600 feet above sea level. On the Norwegian side the country is very wild and mountainous, but the engineers anticipate no difficulties of an unusual nature either as regards the nature of the country, the severe climate, or the snow. This railway, when finished, will be the most northerly railway in the world.

The railway is being built by English engineers, contractors for the Northern of Europe Railway Company (Limited), which was formed in London in 1883, with an authorized capital of £1,500,000 in shares, and £1,500,000 in debentures. The railway has been most favorably regarded in Scandinavia, except by the Swedish iron-masters,

The next morning the gentleman went after John.

"It's as you feared," he said, "and Arthur is so disappointed! Will you come and see what you can do with the little thing? Your master said you were at liberty now."

Always glad to please others, John at once consented, and soon was in the great house where so much sorrow dwelt, for its sweet mistress was dead and her boy a hopeless invalid.

After he had spoken with the pale-faced child, John looked slowly about the room and made a peculiar sound with his lips—something between a whistle and a kiss.

The begonia leaf stirred. He repeated it, when there came from under it a quick, loud "Peep!" and out flew Chip, straight for John, where, almost hiding himself in the boy's coat collar, he fluttered clear around his neck in the funniest little dance of joy you ever saw!

At this the little lame boy laughed so heartily that he had to lean back in his chair, while, looking up, John saw the happy tears spring to the father's eyes.

"It is the first time he has laughed aloud in weeks," he explained to John, as, after putting the now good-natured bird through all his tricks, he was about going away. "John, I know you have a kindly heart, from the way you have tamed this little, wild creature. If your master will consent, would you like to come and be a companion to Arthur—wheel him about, amuse him, read to him? You can read, John?"

"Oh, yes, sir," his eyes sparkling at thought of the books he had pored over by night, and the opportunity this would give him to read more; "and if my master's willing I'll gladly come."

So John and Chip went to the great house and both made the little cripple very happy, but when, in his mercy, God at length took Arthur home, John had become well enough educated to be private secretary to the gentleman, so he remained at a good salary.

And Chip? Alas, that I must tell it!—a cruel cat ate him up! But we hope his end was sudden and painless, for he had richly repaid his kind protector's care.

is, that "Sartor Resartus" will be read with more thorough appreciation in the wiser ages to come than it is at present.

It was a somewhat cynical estimate of the character of his countrymen that Carlyle made when he described Great Britain as a country of twenty-three millions of inhabitants, more or less, mostly fools. But, though he may have been mistaken in his judgement, this at least is to be said in his favour, he possesses the courage of his convictions. And this, in an age of which demagogism is the besetting sin, and the modern hydra, the many-headed monster, is the object of such unstinted adulation, is no small virtue. He did not believe in Schwarmerei, the government of the world by "the count of heads," and he had the courage to say so.

Carlyle, like most great men, especially such of them as have their natures pervaded by the poetic and humorous element, can only be understood and appreciated by such as have some of the same ingredients in their own composition. Like some others of the best things in literature his works must be read between the lines, if their deep earnestness and pathos are to be perceived. In a letter to a friend, written while he was engaged in writing "Past and Present," he affirms that his work made him "sad and sickly." That work was not written con amore, but of necessity. He was goaded to it by a voice which could not be silenced or gainsayed. One who knew the feeling with which he wrote, a personal friend and correspondent, says of this particular work: "Terrible as it is to him to pronounce the words that he does, he feels that these and no others are given him to speak; he sees some twenty thousand in pauper bastilles looking for a Voice, inarticulately beseeching, 'Speak for us,' and can he be silent?"

And when this disagreeable task had been performed, the seer was not at rest, for he felt that more work of the same sort was waiting to be done. After the publication of "Past and Present," John Sterling, his intimate bosom friend, said: "Carlyle does not seem quite happy; though he has blown so loud a blast, and though it has awakened so many deep echoes in the hearts of thoughtful men; there are other trumpets to sound before Truth can get itself recognized, even by those who have gone far."

The "Life of Cromwell" is thought by the critics to be Carlyle's chef d œuvre; but, like all best things, it cost an immense deal of labour and suffering. In a letter to Caroline Fox, he says: "I am about writing upon Oliver Cromwell—still about it; for the thing will not stir from the spot, let me shove it never so desperately! It approaches the impossible, this task of mine, more nearly than any task I ever had. How awaken an oblivious world incognizant of Cromwells, all incredulous of such; how resuscitate a hero sunk under the disastrous wrecks of two such centuries as lie dead on him?" Caroline called on him four months after this, and still found him ill at ease. "He groaned over Oliver Cromwell, for his progress in that memorial is slow and painful; all that had been said or written in his favor had been destroyed or ignored when Charles II. came to reign; as a Calvinistic Christian he was despised; and as a ruler and regicide he was hated; the people would not forgive him for having seemed to deceieve them, and so they dug up his body and hanged it at Tyburn, and have been telling the most abominable lies about him ever since; lately there has been some better feeling, but the case is still very bad."

He felt that in his attempt to put things right, and so put Oliver in a true light before mankind, it was Carlyle against the world. And yet the stubborn and hard-headed Scotchman not only maintained his opinion, but went far toward proving its and £1,500,000 in debentures. The railway has been most favorably regarded in Scandinavia, except by the Swedish iron-masters, who have opposed it from the first, although the export of these iron ores from Lapland can hardly influence the Swedish iron industry, but could rather compete with the interior Spanish ores from Bilbao.

The New Gold Mines in Asia.

The new gold mines discovered in the valley of the Djolgute river are called New California. The valley is upon the Chinese bank of Amoor, opposite the Russian colony of Tgnachino, and as the soil is very marshy, and there is no roads it is only accessible in the winter. Gold was first discovered there in May, 1884, and it soon attracted a great many adventurers, the earliest comers being Russian desertere and escaped convicts from Siberia, and by the month of January in last year there was a colony of 9,000 Russians, the total having been very much increased since, while there are also about 6,500 Chinese and 150 adventurers of different nationalities, the last named of whom have joined the Russians, the organization of the colony being altogether Russian.

The goldfinders are divided into 722 small groups of workmen, all of whom are absolutely equal. These groups elect twelve elders, who did not work themselves, but superintend the diggings, and receive a salary of 200 roubles a month. They are selected from among the dealers in gold and tavern keepers, and form a sort of district police corps. They do not meet with any interference from the Chinese authorities in this remote valley, the laws of which are very simple but severe, the penalty of death being inflicted for cheating at play, for adulterating the gold dust, or for theft; while flogging is inflicted for drunkenness during the hours of labor or for bringing females into the colony.

Since the foundation of the colony there have been only three murders and two inflictions of the death penalty; a Russian having been hung for adulterating the gold dust, and a Jew flogged to death for having spread false news as to the approach of a body of Russian troops, hoping thereby to send down the price of gold owing to the panic. There are twenty-seven taverns in the colony, and, owing to the competition, the prices are not high, except for spirits. The gold fields which are twenty-five miles in length by three miles broad, are said to be very rich, and 7 pounds of gold are obtained from 32 cwt. of gravel, even with the primitive mode of washing adopted there.

The Napanee Express.

NAPANEE, FRIDAY, MAY 7, 1886.

—It is expected that the Dominion Parliament will be prorogued about the 24th of the present month.

—Jas. Beatty, M. P., has accomplished his end. Notwithstanding the revelations in the Beatty-Woodworth affair, the North-West Central Railway bill has been passed by the Railway Committee. Toronto political influence, it is said, proved too strong for the Government to resist. Nothing else could be expected. Jobbers love jobbery and it must have its reward.

—The electors of Lennox and Addington are to be congratulated on having such men as Judge Wilkison and Judge Price acting as Revising Barristers. It is a guarantee of fair play that it indeed comforting in these times of Morganized constituencies. The appointment of such men as Judge Morgan, of York and Judge Boys, of Simcoe, to the position of Revising Barristers is an insult to the County Judges, a large majority of whom are men of the highest honor. By placing such a trust in the hands of unscrupulous partizans, working under an act containing unlimited possibilities for doing wrong, the injustice of the act is brought more fully before the public, and from far and near the cry goes up, let the act be wiped from the Statute book. It is estimated that the cost of working this unnecessary piece of machinery will be upwards of a million of dollars considered, and a satisfactory solution arranged between the different interested parties, more serious dangers to all concerned must inevitably be the result.

THE WHISKEY DROUTH.

How the Act is Received by the People --Hotel-keepers Raise their Rates.

—"The Scott Act !" "The Scott Act ! !"

—Well, the Scott Act is really in force, and we are still alive. Dry, of course, but still able to eat three square meals a day, even if the price has been raised.

—The action of the local hotel-keepers in charging for shed room, and raising the price of meals has been subjected to sharp criticism, and we think unjustly so. Every man using an hotel shed or barn has a right to pay for the accommodation. Heretofore the poor man who drank the whiskey paid in that way for the privilege of free sheds being granted to his temperate neighbor. It was a wrong principle and we are glad that it is changed. Let every man pay for the accommodation that he gets; in other words, let every man pay his own way.

—The same reasoning applies to the question of meals. If the man who drank whiskey had to help pay for meals furnished at twenty-five cents when they were worth thirty-five, the principle was wrong.

—If meals could be furnished at twenty-five cents each before the 1st May, they can be now, though we belive the price now charged is not an unreasonable one, especially for dinner.

—One of our hotels took in $10 fees for shed accommodations on Saturday.

—"The drouth struck us early" is the way one individual announced the incoming of the Scott Act.

—A week ago Saturday one of our hotel men had forty-eight for dinner; last Saturday only ten.

—A couple of drunks on Monday attracted a good deal of attention. Where did they get their liquor ?

—The increase in hotel prices booms Mr. Morris' restaurant, where dinner can be secured for 25c. His tables are filled.

—Last Saturday horses could be seen tied to telegraph poles or any other available stand-point. It was far cheaper than going into an hotel shed.

—We understand the subject of erecting sheds for the free accommodation of farmers teams has been mooted by some merchants. This would certainly convenience the farmers.

—The schooner Nellie Hunter conveyed the stock and household furniture of Mr. W. K. Pruyn to Trenton Monday night. She was towed out of the river by the steamer "Reindeer."

—John Grant & Co. have closed up their store on John-st. None of the hotels have quit business yet. It is hard to say, however, how long some will be able to keep their heads above water.

—The hotel keepers have made a change of rates all around. Meals may now be had for 35c; shed accommodation for a single rig, 10c.; barn accommodation for a team, 25c.; with hay, 40c.; with hay and oats, 50c.

—The inauguration of the Act was announced Saturday morning by a couple of "Italians from Cork," who went about town squeezing the most doleful strains imaginable from Irish bagpipes. The music (?) was certainly dry.

—Hard cider is an effectual antidote for too much Scott Act. A young man got so drunk on ancient apple-juice Wednesday night that he saw 7 electric lights in front of the Brisco House. Had cider not better be placed on the list of intoxicants ?

—It is whispered about town that an enterprising anti-Scott Act party is about to great many farmers in consequence did not "put up" their horses at all, but did their business quickly as possible and returned home. They will be better prepared next Saturday. If prices had been lowered to 5c. there would not have been so much grumbling among the farmers.

—The Scott Act is in force in Brant, Leeds and Grenville, Kent, Lanark, Lennox and Addington, Elgin, Lambton, St. Thomas, Wellington, Frontenac, Lincoln, Middlesex, Victoria, Ontario, Peterboro, Northumberland and Durham; Brame and Chicoutimi, Quebec; and Guysboro, N.S. The Act has been in force in twenty-seven places in the Maritime Provinces, twelve in Ontario, three in Quebec, and two in Manitoba, and is therefore now in operation in sixty-three of the counties and cities of the Dominion.

—The Act came into full force at Guelph on Saturday. All the hotels closed, and farmers coming into the city were unable to get stabling for their teams. Commercial men could not secure accommodation. The contents of the Royal Hotel, which has heretofore been one of the oldest and most notable of Western Canada hostelries, has been sold. Both the proprietors will leave Guelph. Thomas Watts, of the Wellington House has closed his place. The City Hotel has also gone under the hammer. John A. Woods, one of the largest merchants, has given up business and will remove to Parkdale.

The annual meeting of the Mechanics Institute Board of Management was held in in the Town Hall Monday evening, with an attendence of about fifty persons. The Treasurer's statement was presented and adopted. It was as briefly as follows :—

The Librarian's report was then read, reporting the number of books on the catalogue at 1293, with a total issue during the year of 3340, an increase of 200 per cent. over 1885. Although the number of books drawn from class C (fiction) predominated largely over that of other classes, there was an encouraging increase in the demand for books of history, biography, and travels and adventures, especially among the boys. The magazines were circulated to the satisfaction of the membership. There was a most gratifying increase in the circulation of books.

The Director's report briefly reviewed the work and progress of the Institute during the year, which was most satisfactory. The evening classes were well attended with the exception of the drawing classes. The board also thanked Messrs. J. B. McGuin, Geo. M. Elliott, W. J. Black, and F. F. Miller, for their valuable services in connection with the classes. Sympathy was expressed for the family of the late Wm. Tilley, whose loss was mourned by all. He had been a faithful worker in connection with the Mechanics' Institute as secretary, librarian and teacher. The report recommended the amendment of the constitution in accordance with the requirements of the new Act regulating Mechanics' Institutes. The assets of the Institute were estimated at $1,558.41 in excess of the liabilities. In conclusion the injustice of the act is brought more fully before the public, and from far and near the cry goes up, let the act be wiped from the Statute book. It is estimated that the cost of working this unnecessary piece of machinery will be upwards of a million of dollars, while in Lennox alone the cost will be in the neighborhood of two thousand dollars. This represents the price of a bushel of barley to each elector in the riding. To be sure the tax is not a direct one, yet we as surely pay it. It will be one of the questions for the people to decide at the next election, whether or not we shall longer be burdened with this unnecessary evil.

On Tuesday of this week the Colonial and Indian Exhibition was formally opened at London by the Queen. The weather was all that could be desired. Immense crowds thronged the route taken by Her Majesty from Buckingham Palace and greeted her with enthusiastic cheers. The opening ceremonies were conducted in the main hall, after which the Royal party visited the Canadian court. The Prince of Wales, the Duke of Edinburgh, Prince Henry of Battenberg and his wife and Princess Beatrice led the royal procession, and were followed by such notables as Lord Hartington, the Marquis of Salisbury and the Earl of Derby. The Princess Louise also attended the opening. The gay court dresses and the glittering uniforms of the British officers present combined to make a magnificent spectacle. Judging from the appearance of the exhibits already in place the exhibition will prove a decided success.

The Queen was repeatedly cheered most heartily and seemed delighted at the loyal reception accorded her. Her Majesty and the Prince of Wales were presented with handsomely bound copies of the catalogue of Canadian exhibits, the Prince expressing his intention of spending considerable time in the Canadian court later on. Canada's exhibit does credit to her, and no doubt will help dispel the 'eternal snow and ice' delusions which seem to fill the minds of a majority of old country people.

To an interested observer of the political events of the past year, it would seem that a small portion of the superabundant wisdom exhibited in the construction of our wonderful Franchise Bill might have advantageously been directed towards satisfactorily settling the Fisheries question. The great mind who invented such a complicated piece of mechanism must either have exhausted his stock of original ideas, or still have unused material left on hand, which is available for the developement of our beloved country. If the first conjecture is correct, we beg to state that the most of us would have delayed somewhat longer the pleasure of an introduction to the Revising Barrister. The truth compels us to state we would have been much better satisfied had it never been necessary to make his acquaintance at all, rather than that the amicable relations existing between two nations should be endangered, as is the case in the present state of affairs. Poundmaker and his friends possibly might not have suffered materially had they waited a little longer without the power to vote, if by receiving this privilege one of the great industries of our country should be left to the mercy of another nation, or protected simply as it is by a gun boat or two. If more than one such great experiment in lawmaking is not to be expected from our Government, it is very regretable that the Indian and the Revising Barrister had not made their simultaneous appearance on the political stage a little later on, after this far more important question of life or death to the fishing population of the eastern provinces had been attended to. If this matter is not drunk on ancient apple-juice Wednesday night that he saw 7 electric lights in front of the Brisco House. Had cider not better be placed on the list of intoxicants?

—It is whispered about town that an enterprising anti-Scott Act party is about to establish a bus line between Napanee and Deseronto, to be run Saturdays only, for the purpose of enabling tipplers to purchase a weekly supply of "budge." The fare will be 25c. to Deseronto and return.

—Last Friday, the last day of "liberty," as it has been termed by some, was celebrated with great eclat by many bibulistically inclined persons. There were more drunks last Friday floating around town than on an average fair day. In consequence there were numerous sore heads next morning.

—There was not quite as much business done, or so large an attendance of farmers as on the previous Saturday, but it would be difficult to say if this was the effect of the Scott Act. Last Saturday was a remarkly fine day, and no doubt many were kept at home by the rush of spring work, which must be done when the weather is favorable.

—John Brisco, who resides about three miles from Eganville, purchased high wines from a Kingston firm, took it home, drank it freely, and in a short time was unconscious. On the following morning his three year old daughter drank about half a cup of the pure liquor. Inflammation of the bowels set in, death alone ending the excruciating pains.

—The Scott Act enacts that liquor cannot be sold directly or indirectly, but their seems to be a misunderstanding as to the exact meaning of the word "indirectly." According to the best authority it means that one cannot sell anything to a person and then give or convey to him any spirituous liquors. This effectually squelches the old scheme of selling oranges, etc., for 25c. each and afterwards giving the purchaser a sly pull at the flask.

—A young man from a distance arrived in Napanee Saturday morning, totally unaware of the fact that the Scott Act was in force here. He was accordingly obliged to go to Deseronto in order to get "full." This he did at the latter place in true Parisian style, and missed the evening train in consequence. Had he not been offered a ride to Napanee by a friendly acquaintance, he would have been compelled to "Sunday over" at Deseronto. As it was, he reached home all O.K.—except for a sore head.

—On Monday in the House of Commons there was a flood of petitions presented praying that no alteration be made in the Canada Temperance Act. Mr. Jamieson presented one signed by the Bishop of Huron and others, and one was presented by Mr. Beaty, signed by the Mayor of Toronto and many others. Messrs. Robertson, Mulock Somerville, McCraney, Sir Richard Cartwright and others presented these petitions. Besides these a number of petitions signed by municipal corporations were read to the same effect.

—Three young men entered an hotel and called for one bottle of soda water. The pop was handed over, five cents paid for it, and three glasses handed out. The soda water was put into each of the glasses, and then, reaching to his hip pocket one pulled out a flask of sterner stuff, and filled them up. The bar-tender protested that it was unfair to him to have three drinks taken at his bar for which he only received five cents, but 'twas "the Scott Act you know." The treater winked, the bar tender laughed and the boys "smiled again."

—This increase of rates for shed and barn accommodation took the farmers by surprise, no such movement having been expected In order to strictly enfore their demands two of the hotel yards were stoutly barricaded with rope netting, no entrance being possible without the ticket of admission. A

The report recommended the amendment of the constitution in accordance with the requirements of the new Act regulating Mechanics' Institutes. The assets of the Institute were estimated at $1,558.41 in excess of the liabilities. In conclusion the report appealed strongly to the membership for further and continued support. The reports were adopted unanimously.

The election of officers for the ensuing year then took place. The board of management was reduced (in accordance with the provisions of the new law) by doing away with a 2nd vice-president, and reducing the number of Directors from 9 to 5. The following officers were elected by acclamation: Pres., Jas. E. Herring; Vice-Pres., J. B. McGuin; Sec., W. C. Scott; Treas., J. Ferguson; Directors,—L. McGoun, Jas. Taylor, J. J. Taylor, W. N. Doller, P. Slaven. Votes of thanks were passed to the President and Secretary. The date of holding the annual meeting was changed to the first Monday in May, after which the meeting adjourned.

Deseronto's Deformities.

—A truly deplorable state of affairs exist in Deseronto—according to the Tribune. In the last issue of that journal we notice that, "there is an ugly crack in the small bridge on the boundary road just near the slash road, which should be attended to at once by the proper authorities or an accident will surely result." We also observe that there are some "unsightly pools of water and mud in front of the post office," and that an "example will be made of some boys and men who are in the habit of tearing down bills and posters." The Tribune calls attention to the fact that "a number of Deseronto men and boys, without having the fear of the law before their eyes, occupied the greater part of last Sunday by shooting musk-rats from the bridge on the Slash Road. It might be to the interest of our worthy Chief of Police to extend his rambles in that direction next Sabbath." The following paragraph caps the climax:—"Rumours of shocking depravity in a family not far from this village have reached our ears, and if the scandal continues we shall feel it our duty to make a public statement in the interest of justice and public morality" Deseronto truly is a most moral town. The Tribune is evidently determined to Christianize and civilize the inhabitants.

Presenting The Medals.

Saturday forenoon the members of "A" Battery and the 14th P. W. O. Rifles were presented with North West Rebellion medals at the Tete-du-Pont barracks, Kingston. Mrs. Lieut-Col Cottor pinnned the medals to the left breasts of the winners coats. The medals depended from a blue and red ribbon, and were without clasps. The trophies were won by 32 members of "A" Battery and 2 gunners from the Halifax Garrison Artillery. Mrs. Lieut-Col. Villiers presented medals to 9 members of the 14th P. W. O. Rifles. The balance of the 107 medals received by "A" Battery were given to the men previous to their discharge, while 32 of them will be despatched to Moose Jaw. There is displeasure among the soldiers over the unheard-of proceeding of tendering medals to them without clasps. Said one old veteran, "The medal is of little value alone, and unless a clasp is given I guess I'll trade it off for a drink." The medals are about the size of a silver half-dollar, having on the obverse side a cast of Her Majesty's head, surrounded by the inscription, "Victoria Regina et Imperatrix." The other side bears a wreath of maple leaves surrounding "North-West, 1885, Canada." The men have to get their names engraved on the medals at their own expense.

In addition to the great bargains in Damaged Goods announced last week

P. SLAVEN & CO.

Would invite the attention of buyers to a lot of New Goods Opened This Week.

The buyers for the wholesale houses all start for the old country as soon as the spring openings are over for the purpose of buying summer goods and placing orders for fall goods. Their purchases are now to hand and as several lines were purchased at our special request they cannot be found in other stores.

OUR MILLINERY DEPARTMENT

Especially is very attractive just now. Our opening display on the 27th March last was the most successful we ever held, but being so early in the season of course the most of the goods were only suitable for spring wear and are now all sold. We have opened during the past week several cases of NEW SUMMER HATS from New York, London and Paris, such as the Thalia, Andover, Vassar, Thisle, Tulla, Cleta, Juno, Atlanta, Cassino, St. Elmo, Athuton, Amnique, Tarbouche and other new styles especially adapted for summer wear; also large quantities of new Ribbons, Gauzes and trimmings of all kinds. Every lady who wants to be well dressed without paying extravagant prices should see our goods before purchasing as Miss Trevail's good taste may be relied on to sell only what is becoming to them. She has acquired such a perfect mastery of the millinery art during her experience among the most fashionable and refined ladies of Toronto that she seems to have an intuitive knowledge of what is the correct thing for every lady to wear.

In future we will have no wholesale prices on Saturday. We will be glad to see wholesale customers en any week day and will cut prices very fine, but our retail trade is the most important and is increasing so much that everyone that comes in on Saturday must pay retail prices.

We extead a cordial invitation to all our customers and the public generally to visit our store on Saturday evening to see the electric light and the lightnig cash carrier in operation.

The goods go out of the door and the cash goes into the desk so fast that you you can hardly see how it is done.

Two good Milliners and one good Salesman wanted.

A TAME SESSION.

The Waterworks an Almost Settled Question—Unanimously in its Favor.

The regular meeting of the Town Council was held in the council chamber on Monday evening. Present—Mayor Wilson, Reeve Carscallen, Deputy-Reeve Lapum, and Couns. Gibbard, Joy, Bowen, Carson, Aylsworth, Davis, and Lowry.

After the minutes had been read and confirmed, the taxes on Mrs. Prue's property, amounting to about $3, were remitted.

The Fire, Water and Gas Committee were instructed to have the buoys placed in the river.

The Mayor said complaints had been made that the willow tree on Robert-st. in front of Mrs. Baker's, had grown so large as to have filled up the drain and burst open the sidewalk. Attention was also called to the tree on Bridge-st. in front of Mr. R. Easton's residence. —The street inspector was instructed to have the trees chopped down.

STREET SPRINKLING.

A petition signed bynumerous ratepayers was presented praying that the street sprinkler be placed on Dundas-st., from Joy's blacksmith shop to Robert-st., and on John-st., from Dundas to Bridge-sts., including the market square. An extra petition was also presented praying that the services of the street sprinkler be continued from Robert-st. to West-st. This latter petition was referred to the clerk to be dealt with similarly to the former petition. The original petition was referred to the Street Committee with power to act.

Dep.-Reeve LAPUM moved, seconded by Coun. GIBBARD, that the motion disposing of the second petition be reconsidered.—Carried.

Coun. GIBBARD supported his motion by remarking that the motion as worded as present instructed the committee to have that part of the street sprinkled, even if another cart and team had to be placed on the road. It was impossible for one team to do the whole work.

On motion of Coun. GIBBARD, seconded by Dep.-Reeve LAPUM, the second petition was referred to the Street Committee with power to act.

PETITIONS.

A petition was read from Dr. H. L. Cook and others, stating that the drain leading from Robert-st. to Centre-st., on Bridge st, had been tested and found defective, and praying the council to take some action to have it repaired.—Referred to the Street Committee to report.

From Ira Kimmerly and others, asking for a sidewalk 3 feet wide on the east side of Raglan-st., from Dundas to Mill-st.—Referred to the Street Committee to report.

From T. H. Waller and others, asking for a sidewalk on the west side of Union-st., from Dundas to Bridge-st.—Referred to the Street Committee to report,

From a number of ratepayers in the vicinity, asking for a drain on the south side of Dundas-st., from Union to Raglan-st.—Referred to the Street Committee to report.

From Robt. McMillan, asking for a crossing in front of his dwelling on the Camden road.—Referred to the Street Committee with power to act.

A communication was read from Mr. Morrison, of Toronto, calling the attention of the council to the great efficiency of chemical fire engines.—Filed.

John Conger tendered for contract of sprinkling the streets at the rate of $2 per day. There was a little discussion as to the advisability of accepting this offer without a written contract, as the man might get enough of the job and throw it up, thereby leaving the town in the lurch. The matter was finally placed in the hands of the Street Committee with power to act.

Dep.-Reeve LAPUM presented the treasurer's monthly statement, showing an expenditure for the month of $1,390.23, or gross receipts for the year of $10,168.01, disbursements for the month, $1,082.16, and a total expenditure for the year of $6,646.22, leaving a balance of $3,340.97, at the credit of the corporation in the bank.—Adopted.

Coun. JOY presented pay list No. 9, amounting to $47.00, which was adopted. For the Street Committee he also requested further time to report on the petitions of Chas. Lane and others, and Ed. Roberts and others; recommended that no crossings be built in the centre of the blocks; reported that the committee had estimated the expense of paving, gravelling and placing water tables on the streets at $3 per rod; reported a collection of $11.00 by the Chief for dirt, but he had not been able to complete his collections on account of illness; further reported the drain repaired west of the Western Methodist Church, and recommended that the willow tree in front of Mr. Robert Easton's residence be cut down.

The report was taken up [illegible] clause.

Dep.-Reeve LAPUM, that the report be adopted. —Carried.

Nightwatchman Emberson's report was read and filed.

MOTIONS.

Complimentary motions of thanks were made to the Mayor and Council, and chief officers and members of the fire departments of Port Hope, Lindsay and Peterboro, and also to Mr. W. Henderson, Superintendent of waterworks at Peterboro, for their courtesy extended to the deputation, which visited their towns for the purpose of inspecting the waterworks systems in those places.

The motions were unanimously carried.

A resolution of thanks was made Mr. E. A. Bailey, Emigration Commissioner, for his kindness in showing the council through the car of North-West products, which visited this town last week. It was unanimously adopted.

On motion of Coun. GIBBARD, seconded by Coun. AYLSWORTH, the sum of $3 was ordered to be sent to Mr. Sanders, clerk of Port Hope, for a copy of their waterworks contract.

On motion the collector's time was extended to the next regular meeting.

On motion of Coun. CARSON, seconded by Coun. BOWEN, the Street Committee was instructed to purchase the stone which is being taken from Dr. Cook's cellar at 25c. a load.

Moved by Coun. CARSON, seconded by Coun. JOY, that lumber be purchased from Mr. L. F. Doller at $12 per M.—Carried.

On motion the matter of impounding cattle was referred to the street inspector.

Moved by Coun. DAVIS, seconded by Coun. CARSON, that the Court of Revision be held on May 20th, at 10 o'clock.—Carried.

Dep.-Reeve LAPUM introduced a by-law to provide a Court of Revision. The by-law passed its third reading, the court being composed of Uriah Wilson, Mayor, and Councillors Aylsworth, Lowry, Joy and Dep-Reeve Lapum.

Moved by Coun. JOY, seconded by Coun. LOWRY, that Geo. Cliff's account be paid.—Lost.

Moved by Dep.-Reeve LAPUM, seconded by Coun. BOWEN, that the account be referred to the Street Committe with power to act.—Carried.

Moved by Coun. DAVIS, seconded by Deputy-Reeve LAPUM, that Dr. Grant's account be referred to the Poor and Sanitary Committee with power to act.—Carried.

Moved by Coun. LOWRY, seconded by Coun. GIBBARD, that Downey & Co.'s account be referred to the committee on Fire, Water and Gas with power to act.—Carried.

Moved by Coun. DAVIS, seconded by Coun. JOY, that the account of E. J. Hooper be referred to the Finance Committee with power to act.—Carried.

Moved by Coun. CARSON, seconded by Coun. BOWEN, that the Finance Committee be instructed to collect $3 from the treasurer for searching sureties and obtaining abstract, and that the amount be deducted from his pay.—Carried.

Moved by Coun. CARSON, seconded by Coun. LOWRY, that a satisfactorily endorsed note for one month be accepted from Miss Hill for taxes. —Carried.

On motion the sum of $20 was placed in the hands of the Poor and Sanitary Committee.

Moved by Coun. CARSON, seconded by Coun. DAVIS, that Mayor Wilson and Coun. Aylsworth and Gibbard be a special committee to take into consideration the matter of waterworks and report at a special meeting of the council.—Carried.

The council then adjourned.

Rising From the Ashes.

The burnt district is rapidly assuming a business-like aspect again. Mr. John Coates' brick terrace is being swiftly reared sky-ward under the superintendence of Mr. John Conger, who has the contract for the brick work. The work of excavating Dr. Cook's corner is rapidly approaching completion and will be finished probably in a few days. Mr. John Hearns has the contract. Belyat Conger has already commenced laying the stone foundation of the building. The contract for the brickwork on Messrs Carson, Chinneck and Symington's new block has been awarded to Mr. John Tucker, who has commenced work. Mr. Chinneck's jewlery vault has been re-bricked and repaired throughout. The work of clearing the debris from the cellars of Mr. Harshaw's block was delayed somewhat by his difficulty with the insurance companies, but the rubbish is now being carried out by a gang of men and the cellars will be "clean as a whip" in a few days. Material has been laid down and building operations are being pushed forward with the greatest energy. Mr. Coates, proprietor of the Dominion House building, is also erecting extensive sheds in the rear of that hotel. The stores on the north side of street which were scorched by the fire have been repainted and repaired, giving them a neater appearance than before.

—Use Prof. Low's Sulphur Soap for prickly heat, nettle rash, scaley eruption, itch, and all diseased conditions of the skin.

A Double Benefit.

Harry Ricardo, of Toronto, certifies to the benefits received from the use of Hagyard's Yellow Oil as a cure for rheumatism and deafness, his affliction with these combined troubles being a severe one.

Deaths.

WINTERS—At Lonsdale, on Friday, April 30th, Margaret Winters, aged 46 years.

NORRIS—In Richmond, on Tuesday, May 4th, the infant child on Wm. Norris.

PERRY—In Napanee, on Thursday, May 5th, Frances A., beloved wife of J. J. Perry, druggist, aged 33 years, 7 months and 20 days. The funeral takes place to-day (Friday) from her late residence, Dundas-st., at 3:30 p. m.

A Severe Trial.

Those who endure the torturing pangs of neuralgia, rheumatism, sciatics, lumbago, and similar painful complaints are severely tried, but there is a speedy relief in Hagyard's Yellow Oil as thousands who have used it joyfully testify. It banishes pain and lameness quickly.

Cemetery Improvements.

The fine weather has come and the season for having monuments and tombstones erected in the cemeteries. Before buying or promising your orders to anyone, call on V. Kouber. He is noted for doing the best work in this section. See his stock of marble and Scotch and Canadian granite. Yard and works opposite the Beaver office, Napanee. No canvasser employed.

A Modern Miracle.

In a recent letter from R. W. Dawson, of Delaine, Ont., he states that he has recovered from the worst form of dyspepsia, after suffering for fifteen years; and when a council of doctors pronounced him incurable he tried Burdock Blood Bitters, six bottles of which restored his health.

THE WATERWORKS.

Coun. GIBBARD, for the special committee appointed to visit Port Hope and some places re the investigation of a waterworks system, reported as follows:—

NAPANEE, MAY 30th, 1886.

To the Mayor and Council:—

We, your committee, selected to visit Port Hope and other towns to inspect their water works system, beg leave to submit the following:—

1. We visited Port Hope, Lindsay and Peterboro, where we were shown every courtesy, and their officials took every pains to impart all in their power to us regarding waterworks The Mayor and Council of Port Hope met us upon our arrival, and escorted us to their fire hall, where everything was in readiness. After our inspection of the hall the fire alarm was given to the man who had charge of the pumps, and the hose company at once turned out, and in a few minutes there were four streams playing through 100 feet of hose, throwing over 30 feet above a very high four-storey building through 1¼ in. nozzle; and your committee were very favorably impressed with their system of waterworks.

2. Your committee then visited Lindsay, and were given a cordial reception by their Mayor and Council, who took every pains to inform your committee regarding their system, called out their fire brigade and gave a display, which also pleased your committee.

3. Your committee learning that Peterboro had just put in waterworks which were recommended as being of the latest improved pattern, we proceeded to that town, and through the courtesy of their Mayor we with him visited the pumps and station and found the most improved pumps working to our entire satisfaction We then were kindly offered by the secretary of the Waterworks Co. the services of their superintendent, Mr. W. Henderson, who spent part of the forenoon giving us very valuable information, he being one of the most practical men in the province. His estimates for about one mile of 6 inch pipe and ½ mile of 8 inch pipe with 17 hydrants of the latest improved pattern, laid in our town would cost $7,000, and the buildings with the machinery $3,000, making the total cost about $10,000.

4. Your committee would recommend that if any additional fire protection be added to our town, that it be the Holly system of waterworks.

Signed,

URIAH WILSON, Mayor.
J. AYLSWORTH,
W. T. GIBBARD.

Coun. GIBBARD said they had recommended the adoption of the Holly system of waterworks because of their great superiority over any other system. The Holly system differed from other systems, in that it forced the water directly through the pipes by strong pumps, whereas other systems supplied water by reservoirs. He briefly reviewed their visit to Port Hope and Peterboro, and wound up by giving some figures, relative to the size of pumps and pipes. If Napanee was to have any waterworks, the best and only the best should be had.

The Mayor called the attention of the council to the recommendation of the committee that the Holly system be adopted. The question was now open for discussion.

Coun. DAVIS said he understood that another superior system of waterworks was in use in the United States. It would be well to investigate the truth of the rumor.

Coun. GIBBARD replied that there were only two systems of waterworks—the pumping system and reservoir system. The difference was only in the pumps. The Holly Co. did not make a first-class pump.

The Mayor and Coun. GIBBARD gave some figures relative to the Holly system of waterworks, but as all this will come out at the public meeting to be held, we will not enter into any detailed statement here.

Coun. AYLSWORTH, CARSON and DAVIS carried on a desultory conversation for a few minutes when Coun. BOWEN moved, seconded by

MANHOOD

HOW LOST. HOW RESTORED !

We have recently published a new edition of Dr. Culverwell's Celebrated Essay on the radical and permanent cure (without medicine) of Nervous Debility Mental and Physical Incapacity, Impediments to Marriage, &c., resulting from excesses.

☞ Price, in a sealed envelope, only 6 cents, or two postage stamps.

The celebrated author, in his admirable Essay, clearly demonstrates, from thirty years' successful practice, that alarming consequences may be radically cured without the dangerous use of internal medicines or the use of the knife; pointing out a mode of cure at once simple, certain and effectual, by means of which every sufferer, no matter what his condition may be, may cure himself cheaply, privately and radically.

☞ This Lecture should be in the hands of every youth and every man in the land.

AN EGYPTIAN ROMANCE.

A Story of Love and Wild Adventure, founded upon Startling Revelations in the Career of Arabi Pasha.

By the Author of "NINA, THE NIHILIST," "THE RED RIDER," "THE RUSSIAN SPY, ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER LVII.

BEHIND THE CURTAIN IN THE HAREM OF THE WAR MINISTER.

Whilst the first victory upon Egyptian soil has thus been gained by her husband, Nellie is half guest and half captive within the pink walls of Arabi Pasha's palaces at Cairo.

The war minister had kept his word by dispatching her and her parents thither, exactly as he had promised he would do, and here she has been during the whole of the five intervening weeks, leading a dull and sadly monotonous life behind the harem curtain, seeing her mother daily, but her father never once, for he might not enter into that supposed sanctuary of female loveliness though it ottimes screens female hideousness as well.

So Mr Trezarr is the guest of the war minister's only son, a pleasant gentlemanly youth, who does his best to make the banker's enforced imprisonment bearable to him, and never lost an opportunity of informing him that if he were to venture forth into the street he would assuredly be killed, and who has always some wondrous tale to tell of the sinking of British ironclads, or the annihilation of British armies, or that the Sultan was on his way to help them, for the Egyptain leaders were quite clever at the spreading of false reports as were the Russians.

Very similar tales were told to Nellie by Arabi Pasha's wife, only to her account was always added something of the miraculous, as was to be expected from a lady who believed in sorcery and always kept a dream interpeter in her employ in whose predictions she placed the most implicit confidence.

Nellie felt very uncomfortable in this lady's presence at first, lest she might know or guess the future that was intended to be in store for her and feel angry or hurt thereby. But she before long broached the subject of her own accord, and it did not appear to be at all a sore one.

"When you are my sister we shall love each other very much," she murmured gently.

"When I am your sister? I don't exactly understand?' answered Nellie; nor did she.

"Why, when you are Ahmed's wife we shall be sister, shall we not? That is what all wives of one man call each other in this country, and they generally love each other like real sisters as well. That is to say, when they have so good and kind a husband as Ahmed, you know."

"Then I must be your sister already, for the pasha believes that he has married me."

"Believes, little one? If he has done so he must know for certain, I should say."

"Well, he thinks so then," rejoined Nellie, petulantly, "but I am quite sure that he has not, first, because I was no consenting party, and secondly, because I was another man's wife at the time."

"Ah, but, little sister, if any one has made a mistake in the matter it must be yourself, for you are young and doubtless foolish, whilst Ahmed Arabi has the wisdom of more than double your years, and beside, he would not do wrong to the meanest thing that breathes. A good and blessed thing it is to be the wife of such a man, for she never hears an angry word drop from his lips. He

At this point the Valide Khanoum glanced up off the letter at her auditor, to note what effect it had made upon her and she uttered a little cry of mingled pity and consternation upon perceiving that her "little sister," as she delighted to call her, had sunk down upon a softly pillowed divan in a dead swoon.

CHAPTER LVIII.

FRANK DONELLY AT LAST CROSSES SWORDS WITH ARABI.

When Captain Donelly fell back with his little force on the main body of his regiment, carrying his wounded and the captured Egyptian battery, he received some praise from the colonel for the success which had attended his reconnaisance, and upon his representations and at his request Pat Monaghan was given a corporal's chevrons on the spot.

It was not the time to rest on a mere handful of laurels, however, for the war upon which they had entered was to be one of the sabre and the spur far more than of the cannon and the rifle.

Within twelve hours of this brush at El-Magfar Sir Garnet Wolseley felt strong enough to press on towards Cairo, for he knew that against an Oriental foe dash and daring were everything. With General Drury Lowe's splendid cavalry brigade, Graham's fire-eating Irish and Scottish infantry and the stolid English guards, under the Queen's third son, the Duke of Connaught, who, if not very quick in the advance, would at all events, be a deuced deal slower in running away, he prepared to carry a strong position at El-Mahula, ten miles nearer to the capital

But the Egyptians found out that they only doubled in number the British and so retreated precipitately directly they came in view.

Thereupon, Drury Lowe's cavalry, comprising the Irish dragoons, the Life Guards and an Indian lance regiment, made a sweeping flank movement on Mahsameh station and the railway, hoping to get in their rear and cut them off to a man, but the Egyptians were so swift footed and the ground so bad for cavalry that he failed in this.

By midnight the British vanguard, consisting of General Graham's brigade of 1,800 bayonets, a Bengal lance regiment and our friends, the Irish dragoons, were at Khassassin, with their nearest supports half a dozen miles in their rear and the slow moving guards just as far to the rear of them again.

The British van had thus accomplished a quarter of the distance to Cairo with no loss at all to speak of, but now intelligence was gathered that at Tel-el-Kebir, some dozen miles in advance of them, Arabi Pasha had formed a perfect desert Gibraltar, with three lines of defenses, all defended by heavy batteries of Krupp guns, and that there he had displayed the green standard of the prophet and had called together the ulemas to bless his cannon and his cause, all this that his soldiery might be brought to consider defeat impossible.

Such a formidable position, defended by so many heavy cannon and manned by five times as many soldiers as the British could bring up against him, formed ample grounds to authorize such hopes and fill him with such convictions.

pounds against my ribs more joyously than it has done for weeks, for he who has stolen my young wife leads that cavalry in person, and I will soon discover whether either his sword or his vaunted talisman can guard his life," responded Frank, as he looked back at Pat with flashing eyes and grinning teeth.

At this moment the gray-haired colonel shouted in clarion-like tones:

"Close up! Close up! At them like an iron wedge, my lads? Gallop! Ch-arge!"

A joyous ringing shout, a momentary flash of sword blades in the air, the neighing of the war horses rushing to the battle, the blare of trump, the clattering of empty sword scabbards and the jingling of chain bridals was succeeded the next instant by the shock of the charge (for, inspirited by their great leader's presence among them, the Moslem cavalry came to the scratch for once), and then steel rang on steel and horse bit at horse, and there was the horrid noise of cloven skulls and the thud of falling men, all intermingled with shrill British cheers, the demon-like Arab tecbir or battle cry, curses, shrieks and groans, and now and then a pistol shot, but, strange to say, this latter few and far between.

Amidst the tumultuous sea of swaying human forms and tossing horse's heads it was some little while before Frank Donelly could discover him whom he especially sought, but suddenly in the very thickest of the strife, he found himself face to face with him.

The recognition was mutual, and the next instant their blades were crossed.

Both had been previously whetted, and both Briton and Egyptian was full of the blood lust that is ever born of such deadly strife.

This, added to the private animosity that each bore unto the other, made them fierce indeed, and they attacked each other so furiously that sparks of fire flew from the tempered steel, and almost immediately they were engaged to the very hilt.

Both were superp swordsmen and each horse knew how to aid its rider by rear, demi-volt and curvet, but the Damascus steel had for once to succumb to the well forged Sheffield blade—for Damascus forging is not what it once was—and Arabi Pasha found himself all in a moment grasping little more than the hilt of his weapon, for nine-tenths of the blade had been whirled into the air.

There was no time to draw a pistol from his holster, for his rival's sword was at his throat, and there was death in that rival's eyes, if it was expressed by human orbs.

"Strike," gasped Arabi in French, "strike! Do I look as though I was afraid to die?"

For a moment longer Frank Donelly striking aspect of one who could not help hetbero, but then he suddenly lowered his sword point, at the same instant hissing between his teeth:

"Shall a Christian be outdone in generosity by a Moslem? Never. Retain your life, at whatever cost to me and mine. I cannot take it," and as though fearful that he might still be tempted to do otherwise, he wheeled his charger sharp round and galloped away.

But by this time the battle was nearly over. The Egyptian infantry were in full retreat and a second or two later the Egyptian cavalry also broke and fled, whilst the Irish dragoons, now reinforced by the swarthy Bombay cavalry, pursued them across the desert plain to almost under the guns of the Tel-el-Kebir batteries.

"Phil."

There were a bent and trembling old man—a white-haired and broken old woman, and as they sat beside the coffin the old man said:

"He was about ten years old. We found him in a basket on our door step one night foolish, whilst Ahmed Arabi has the wisdom of more than double your years, and beside, he would not do wrong to the meanest thing that breathes. A good and blessed thing it is to be the wife of such a man, for she never hears an angry word drop from his lips. He is really one in a thousand, and now that he has sunk all the English ships and taken the English King prisoner he will doubtless be made the sovereign of all Egypt and will be almost as great as the Sultan himself."

His taking of the English King prisoner amused Nellie, despite the sorrows of her heart. After that she saw it would be a vain and foolish thing to pump the Valide Khanoum as to how the war was going on, since her replies would be very untrustworthy indeed.

From that date Nellie felt that she should know no rest until she was possessed of better information concerning affairs of moment outside her gilded prison.

Mrs. Trezarr accommodated herself to her changed position wonderfully well.

She felt a keen interest in the most trivial themes of harem gossip, and would roll her eyes and clap her hands at any marvelous narration as though to the manner born. As to Mr. Trezrrr, she seldom even inquired after him, such conduct marking the difference between living with a husband twenty years and two hours.

One day the Valide Khanoum came into Nellie's little room with an open letter in her hand and a face that was very cheerful and bright, and addressing the fair girl by her usual affectionate epithet of "Little Sister," said to her in excited tones:

"I am the bearer of good new. I have received a letter from our lord and husband."

"And what news does his letter contain and how is he?" said Nellie, desirous as much for information on several points as she was anxious to put a stop to this indiscriminate praise of one whom she was firmly resolved should never be any more to her than he was at the present moment.

The Valide Khanoum quickly made answer:

"Praise be to Allah and his only prophet, he could not be better and he writes in the highest spirits. Hear what he writes, little sister, for though he writes in Arabic, as a true believer ever should. I will do my best to turn it into, I hope, understandable French."

Nellie nodded her head, for she was too agitated to speak, save when of necessity.

"Our lord and husband is a great man, but I need not trouble you with the commencement of his letter, since it mostly consists of compliments addressed to myself. I will dip into the middle of it at once, where he declares that he has at last got the Feringhee invaders in the hollow of his hand and has had to close it in order to utterly crush them. He next pays many compliments to their courage and the generalship of their chiefs, but says that their graves, nevertheless, await them at Tel-el-Kebir and that in another sun and moon, by which he means a day and night, they will have occupied them and Egypt be free. And now comes the all important part of our lord's letter, little sister. He goes on to say that the very hour in which he is crowned with victory he shall hurry hither and change from conquerer to slave in your presence, but he hopes my kind heart, quick sympathy and good counsel (what sugar plums of speech for the both of us!) have ere now taught us to yield freely and without regret to the inevitable (there you see, little sister, he says the inevitable and so there is no getting out of it,) though, if not, it will not much matter, he adds for it will only leave him the task he had intended for me, that of teaching you himself to bless the inevitable and to thank Allah that he had not given you to a Ghiour."

Such a formidable position, defended by so many heavy cannon and manned by five times as many soldiers as the British could bring up against him, formed ample grounds to authorize such hopes and fill him with such convictions.

But at the last moment he had not sufficient patience to wait for the hated foe to immolate themselves in front of the grinning muzzles of his cannon, but on learning how far the British vanguard had pushed ahead of its supports, and its paucity of numbers as well, he resolved to attack it at once with overwhelming odds, roll it up and have done with it.

So he quitted his trenches and advanced on Khassassin in force during the night, hoping to catch General Graham napping, but that gallant commander slept with one eye open, weasel fashion, and his out pickets were too tried soldiers to sleep at all, so the sea-like murmur of the advancing Egyptians was challenged in three different places at once by the wasp-like "ping-ping-ping" of British rifles, and the out sentries retiring on the pickets the alarm spread like lightning, and within five minutes the infantry brigades were falling in at the double and the cavalry trumpets were sounding "boots and saddles."

By this time the Egyptains' shells were whistling into the British camp, fired point blank like cannon balls, and knocking over the red-coated infantry like ninepins.

But before they had done much damage a battery of horse artillery ran their guns up to the top of a sand hill and began to give them cold iron in turn, so that for a little while it was "bowl devil, bowl baker," and when the British infantry deployed as steady as on parade and peppered the dusky foe with their Henri-Martinis, the seasoning was so hot that it seemed to turn their stomachs for fighting.

But hark to the screeching of the railway engines as they bring up long lines of open cars, all crowded with soldiery, to the support of their comrades, and behold away to the left the dark clouds of Egyptian cavalry sweeping across the plain with the evident resolve of outflanking the small British force, even if their further aim is not to drive every mother's son of them into the narrow Fresh Water Canal.

An aide-de-camp at this juncture galloped up to the First Dragoons and saluting the colonel, says tersely, as he points his drawn sword towards the advancing horse:

"The general looks to you to account for those fellows, I am sure I need say no more."

"Not a word, sir, to either me or my men," was the proud retort as the veteran drew his sword.

Its brandish in the air was sufficient signal for every trumpet to blow out, for every knee to grip the pigskin, for every foot to turn in and every heel to drop.

Obedient to each brazen sound the regiment formed by the troops, changed into serried squadrons and then advanced out into the plain at a rapid trot in a glittering column of squadrons at wheeling distance.

It was a grand sight to see a body of men so cooly advancing to engage a force that outnumbered them by at least five to one, and who were evidently the elite of the enemy's cavalry.

Then, suddenly, a fearful shell fire was opened upon them from a battery on the railway bank, and many a man and horse was rolled over.

But not the slightest apparent confusion in their ranks was occasioned thereby, and Pat Monaghan presumed on their long close intercourse to observe to Captain Donelly, whose horse's tail twitched the newly-made corporal's charger's nose,

"Bedad, an' this is a hard pounding, yer honor; but the laugh will be to them who pound the longest."

"Right, my brave fellow, and my heart

XIII.

There were a bent and trembling old man—a white-haired and broken old woman, and as they sat beside the coffin the old man said:

"He was about ten years old. We found him in a basket on our door-step one night in the long ago. We were old people then, but wife she begged that we should take the little stranger in and care for him."

"Because my own children were sleeping under the sod," she explained as she wiped the tears away.

"So we made him our child," resumed the old man, "and in a little time we came to love him as if he had been born to us. He was a strange boy—quiet, gentle, thoughtful, sorrowful. There seemed to be a burden of grief weighing him down. He came to know in time—not from us, but from others—that he was no kin to us, and it troubled him much. Not that he did not love us but that we were old and poor, and he felt himself a burden upon us. Last night a creditor came and abused us because we could not pay a debt. Little Pail had crept off to bed, but he must have been awake yet and heard every word. The man was angry because we could not pay, and he said something about our picking up paupers to feed and clothe. If it was his case, he said, he'd ship the boy off to the County House."

"I went in to say good night to him," whispered the woman, "but he had his face to the wall and seemed to be asleep. We hoped he had not heard the harsh words, for we knew how they would wound him. Why, sir, if worst comes to worst, I'd have gone hungry to give that boy food. He was the bit of sunshine in our lives."

"In the morning when I got up," said the father, "I called to Phil, but he did not answer. I entered the room to find that he had put a rope over one of the clothes-hooks and strangled himself—committed suicide. He must have got up soon after we went to bed, for his body was cold and stiff."

"And—and he left this on the stand," sobbed the woman as she held out a note.

It was written on the leaf of an old memorandum book, and the writing was in pencil. It read:

"I no you wouldn't send me to the county house, but you are poore and in det. I'd go away if I could, but I doan't no where to go. Doan't feel bad. If God lets me into Heven I'll see you up there.—PHIL."

Disraeli's Assurance

A little volume has recently been published made up of the correspondence of Lord Beaconsfield with his sister in the years 1832-1842. This man's career was indeed wonderful, and it is interesting to observe the young Hebrew novelist, Benjamin Disraeli, foretelling his subsequent career. His firm belief in his talents is thus expressed in a letter written to his sister in 1833:

Went to the House of Commons to hear Bulwer adjourn the House; was there yesterday afternoon during the whole debate—one of the finest we have had for years, Bulwer spoke, but he is physicially disqualified for an orator, and, in spite of all his exertions, can never succeed. He was heard with great attention, and is evidently backed by a party. Heard Macaulay's best speech, Shiel, and Charles Grant. Macaulay admirable; but between ourselves I could floor them all. This entre nous: I was never more confident of anything than that I could carry everything before me in that House. The time will come!

His brother Ralph, who edits the collection, adds with evident pride this foot-note: "Thirty-five years after he was Prime Minister."

Fond parents should not forget that a child can shoot a pistol as hard as anybody—especially a pistol that is unloaded.

HEALTH.

Cautions for the Aged.

Age works great physical changes, many of which are generally recognized. Some of them involve dangerous liabilities, and impose the need of constant caution.

One is to guard against undue exertion. The tough, elastic coat of the arteries is apt to become, on the one hand, chalk-like and brittle, or, on the other hand, fatty and weak. Nature seeks to guard against the consequent danger by rendering older persons less inclined to effort. But a little extra exertion put forth suddenly, may cause the weakened vessels to give way, from the increased force with which the heart throws the blood into them. Hence may result apoplexy or fatal aneurism—the latter being a sudden bulging out of arteries.

So, too, the heart itself (or its aorta—the great curved trunk which first receives the blood from the heart) may be in a similar condition, and suddenly fail because of undue exertion, when it might have been equal to the ordinary work of years. Such no doubt was the last case, when an elderly gentleman hurried to reach a railroad train, and fell dead on entering it. The aged should firmly refuse to hurry.

A like caution applies to whatever quickens the action of the heart. Every one knows the power of violent emotions in this respect. No one wishes to fall dead in a fit of anger. Undue eating, especially of stimulating food, is almost as dangerous. All the appetites need to be kept under control.

A special caution is needed in descending the stairs. In our normal voluntary movements there are certain nice adjustments affected by unconscious mental acts. But age effects such a change in the brain substance that mental activity is lessened. An old man can no more think as quickly as a young than he can run as fast, or jump as high. Hence the missteps of the aged in descending stairs. Aged persons, therefore, should form the habit of taking their bearing, so to speak, at the top of the stairs, and keep their mind on each step down by a conscious voluntary effort.

The aged should also most carefully guard against a chill. It is more dangerous for an old man to catch cold than for a young man to catch a fever.

Pack the Lungs with Air.

Deep breathing and holding of the breath is an item of importance. Persons of weak vitality find an uninterrupted succession of deep and rapid aspiration so distressing that they are discouraged from perserving in the exercise. Let such persons take into the lungs as much air as they can at a breath and hold it as long as they can, and they will find a grateful sense of relief in the whole abdomnial region. Practice will increase ability to hold the breath and the capacity of the lungs. After a time the art may be learned of packing the lungs. This is done by taking and holding the long breath and then forcing more air down the treachæ by swallows of air. The operation may be described by that of a fishe's mouth in water. To those who have never learned it will be surprising to what extent the lungs may be packed. Caution at first is needful but after practice will warrant large use of the treatment. The whole thoracic and abdominal cavities will receive immediate benefit and continuance and temperance in eating, good air and right exercise, will bring welcome improvement.

VICTORIA CITY.

What an Englishman Says of British Columbia's Capital.

An Englishman thus writes of Victoria, B. C. :— The climate of Victoria appears to me all that could be desired. Thoroughly temperate and healthful; winter short and pleasant, with a very scanty snowfall; summers such as we in England and Ireland remember with regret, or hear our elders tell of many years ago. The only complaint I heard was concerning a cool breeze which blows every evening with greater regularity, coming over the Olympian snow-range in Washington territory. It acted on my constitution like a most invigorating cold bath. The country round Victoria is lovely. The roads are fringed with thickets of wild roses, and here and there wild strawberries carpet the ground. Gorse and brown (both from the old country) in immense bushes. The roads remind one of the lanes in Kent, but nowhere in Kent is such luxuriance of vegetation; such wealth of green and light and shadow. A land of extreme beauty; a very paradise of scenery, with the great snowy background of the Olympian range. Compared with Victoria—this Belle of the Pacific—Tunbridge Wells is the worn-out commons, and Brighton and Eastbourne, with all their wealth, are far outshone by the natural charms of the Canadian Pacific.

* * * A most lovely neighborhood But, oh! these Victorians want to make up their destiny; to learn to spend as well as make money; to drain, and clean, and water, and light, and do the very little nature has not done for them. Day by day the dusty streets are swept by the breeze to the infinite discomfiture of the dweller and visitor. Night by night the noxious gasses of their primitive roadside gutters are disinfected by the cool draft from the mountains. Were it otherwise they would soon learn their penny wisdom was pound foolishness, and even as it is, typhoid is too common,

A Sleeping Car Incident.

In a sleeping car, just at the time when the seats were being turned into beds, I happened to be lazily eyeing a bridal couple on their honeymoon tour. How did I know? Because for an hour her head had been laying on his shoulder. Might they not have been married several years? No; her manner did not have the confident, proprietary air of an accustomed wife. Then why was I sure that they were not an enamoured pair, unjoined by wedlock? Because the girl was neither ashamed or defiant. Nobody ever makes a mistake in picking out honeymoon tourists. Therefore, the negro porter of the car astounded me when he said to the young husband:—"Wouldn't yo' sistah, sah, like to have her berth let down?" She lifted her head from the martial shoulder, smiled sweetly, and murmured, "Yes."

"This is my wife, you rascal," said the man, but with what seemed to me singular amiability; "you needn't make up the upper berth in this section. The lower one will be enough."

"Beg pardon, sah. Yes, sah;" and the porter went at the job with the kind of vim and alacrity never seen in a darkey who isn't sure of a special fee.

The incident puzzled me, and I sought an early opportunity to get the porter's explanation.

"It's dis way, boss," he said, "de brides den't like to be spotted. 'Course dey is ebery time, but dey flatter demseleves dat dey can't be told from odder ladies. 'Sperience teaches me dat dey is tickled mightily ef you mistakes dere husbands fo' brudders. I does it ebery time now, an' hits 'em fo' a Palatable and Pure.

Distilled water is not essential to good health. It is "flat, stale and unprofitable." Unless well erated it is unpalatable. The process of distilling separates the mineral matter, but not the volatile substance. The con pounds of nitrogen and sulphur may reappear in the distilled water, and the peculiar odor so repulsive to delicate tastes. If clean soil-water cannot be obtained, make a large, deep and clean cistern, and keep it clean. Take a sound oak or ash barrel, put a false bottom (perforated) 3 inches from the bottem of the barrel; place three inches of clean washed gravel on the top of the perforated bottom; on this twelve inches of granulated charcoal, made from hard maple; on this 4 inches of clean washed sand, and then place a perforated false top over the sand, so that water poured into the barrel will not disturb the filtering materials beneath. Insert a wooden faucet in the side of the barrel, close to the bottom, and you will have a filter which will make good rainwater filtered through it as clean and palatable as can be desired.

Eating Lemons.

A good deal has been said through the papers about the healthfulness of lemons. The latest advice is how to use them so that they will do the most good, as follows: Most people know the benefit of lemonade before breakfast, but few know that it is more than doubled by taking another at night also. The way to get the better of the bilious system without the blue pill or quinine is to take the juice of one, two, or three lemons, as appetite craves, in as much ice-water as makes it pleasant to drink without sugar, before geing to bed, In the morning, on rising, at least a half-hour before breakfast, take the juice of one lemon in a goblet of water. This will clear the system of humor and bile with efficiency, without the weakening effects of calomel or congress water. People should not irritate the stomach by eating lemons clear.

Bad Effect of Pickles.

The influence of acid in retarding or arresting salivary digestion is further of importance in the dietectic use of pickles, vinegar, salads and acid fruits. In the case of vinegar it was found that one part in 5000 sensibly retarded this process, a proportion of one in 1,000 rendered very slow, and one in 500 arrested it completely; so that when acid salads are taken together with bread the effect of the acid is to prevent any salivary digestion of the bread, a matter of little moment to a person with a vigorous digestion, but to a feeble dyspeptic one of some importance. There is a very widespread belief that drinking vinegar is an efficacious means of avoiding getting fat, and this popular belief would appear from these experimental observations to be well founded. If the vinegar be taken at the same time as farinaceous food it will greatly interfere with its digestion and assimilation.

The Wreck of the "Algoma."

The C. P. R. authorities mean to raise part of the cargo and the engines of the wrecked steamer "Algoma." The cargo embraces a valuble consignment of steel rails. Drivers have visited the wreck and declare that there will be no difficulty in raising the most valuable part of the freight. The company have called for tenders from the leading wrecking companies of the United States.

pool some time during May in connection with the International Exhibition to be opened in that city. Her Majesty's last visit to Liverpool took place October 9, 1851, when she was accompanied by the Prince Consort, the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, and the Princesses Alice and Helena.

The Prince of Wales is said to be troubled with chronic dyspepsia. Too much high living will bring a prince as well as a plebeian to grief. The stomach of royalty differs in no way from the stomach of every day life. As the Prince sets the fashion in England, dyspepsia should be very popular there just now. In fact, no real "swell" can afford to be without it.

Dr. Mary Putnam Jacobi told the Nineteenth Century Club that woman has become "discursive and superficial" in her habits of mind, because she has always three things to think of, the pot on the fire, the baby and the expected husband coming home in a stew. Whereupon one of the fashionable ladies, of whom the audience was chiefly composed, whispered to her neighbor: "Neither the pot, the baby nor the husband ever trouble me. Do they you?"

The number of suicides at Monaco appear to be increasing at an alarming rate. One of the noblest families of Austria has been thrown into mourning by the death of a son at Monte Carlo, who, after losing over $20,000 at the gaming table, blew his brains out in the doorway of Monsieur Blanc's establishment on the 20th February last. It is announced on good authority that the Italian Consul of Monaco has just been arrested at Rome for falsifying, and in some cases totally suppressing, the reports of the deaths by suicide at Monte Carlo of Italian subjects.

The Deadly Knife in Sicily.

A horrible deed of blood committed near Girgenti gives an illustration of the use of the knife in the Island of Sicily. Two butchers, father and son, of the name of Indelicato, who kept a shop in that town, not long since took two brothers, named Alfonso and Giovanni Cannetonis into partnership. Before long the Cannetonis began to trade in lambs' carcasses separately on their own account, and disagreements arose, which ultimately led to a collision between Baldassare Indelicato and Alfonso Cannetoni. They drew their butcher's knives from their belts on each other. Alfonso aimed a well-directed blow at Baldassare. He parried it with his left arm, which was cut to the bone, and at the same instant drove his knife into the heart of Alfonso, who fell dead on the spot. At that moment a young son of Alfonso, aged 19, came up with a bludgeon to his father's assistance. Baldassare struck him to the ground, and then cut his throat across, "as he would have slaughtered a sheep." Mad with rage, Baldassare then rushed into the shop, and taking Giovann the brother of Alfonso, by surprise, killed him with a slash across the abdomen. Turning then to leave the shop, he inflicted a serious wound on a person just entering. All this occurred within the space of four minutes, the result of the collision being three persons killed and two wounded.

What with strikes and defaulting bankers and treasurers the lump in this country's throat never gets a chance to subside.

The codfish continues to grow indefinitely, without regard to age, so long as it has a plentiful supply of food. The eldest codfish are the largest, and they sometimes grow to be as long as a man is high. They swim about near the bottom of the sea, not often ascending to the surface, feeding on all sorts of animal life, such as crabs, shell fish and other small fish, but not on vegetable.

The Cruelties of Heathenism.

On his way to the centre of Africa, Mr. F. S. Arnot wrote from Bihe as follows to Mr. Sanders at Ballundu, concerning "a Bihe barbarity": "A few days ago I noticed a little boy, about eight years of age, who belongs to Ruskit's town close by, going about with both his hands in a sad mess. The left one was completely distorted and three of the fingers jointed together in one red, sore mass, the palm bulging forward. the arm above the wrist was skinned and also the right hand. I found that this youngster had been out visiting at the king's town or somewhere near there. The boy in playing about had stolen some beans belonging to a daughter of Jamba Yamina, the king, they call her Naroma Cunengile, who, to punish the child for stealing her beans, put his hands into a pot of boiling water. I have seen something of that work before, and from the state of the child's hand's she must have kept the left hand, at least, for a few seconds in the water. The poor little fellow, smart and good-looking, is injured for life, and this creature in woman's shape has not been called in question for her cruelty. If you are passing here at any time, you could see the child; the boiled hand beggars description."

To this Mr. Sanders adds:—

"People talk of the innocence of the heathen, but they only need to live in a heathen land to learn that 'the dark places of the earth are full of the inhabitants of cruelty.' What do you think of a man taking his hands full of dried grass, setting it on fire and then applying it to the naked shoulders and breast of his wife, simply because his beans were not cooked quite as soen as he thought they ought to be? This has happened here in Cnilumi.

The Good Die Young.

The right kind of a fellow is modest and mellow and generous and brave and benign;
His nature's apparent and clear and transparent like yours, gentle reader, and mine
He has no verbosity, no tongue tortuosity, and he never is boastful and loud;
He is gentle and quiet and plain in his d'et, and never gets mad in a crowd;
He's grand and majestic, yet meek and domestic, and spends his spare evenings at home;
He's a tireless searcher for all kinds of virtue like the author and proprietor of this pome;
He don't play the fiddle, part his hair in the middle, nor dress like an Anglican dude.
When he goes to a party with Meigs or McCarty he never is noisy and rude;
He lives in frugality and sweet conjugality, and wants pie but two times a day;
He never eats onions nor treads on your bunions nor growls when you get in his way;
He's wise and he's witty, pe severing and grit ty, and has a magnificent head;
He's all light and sweetness, he's thorough completeness, he's perfection in short—but he's dead!

More than four thousand devices for coupling have been patented, and yet thousands of bachelors and maidens go it alone in this country.

A young married lady who moved into the country from a city home considered keeping hens a pleasant and profitable duty. As she became more absorbed in the pursuit her enthusiasm increased, and "hens" made a favorite subject of her thoughts and conversation. During one of her animated descriptions of success, a friend inquired: "Are your hens good hens?" "Oh, yes," she replied in a delighted tone, "they haven't laid a bad egg yet."

"I Will Praise The Lord."

BY L. A. MORRISON.

"I will sing of thy mercy in the morning"
—Psalm ix 16

My Father, this morning my spirit is praising
Thy Fatherly keeping so bounteous and free,
In gladness a song of thanksgiving is raising
For pardon and mercy and favors from Thee.

Through the night Thou has shielded and given sweet slumber;
Each pathway in Dreamland with angels was trod
My soul for Thy blessings and gifts beyond number
With rapture adores Thee, my Father and God.

Each day that Thou givest is token of kindness;
Is proof of Thy Fatherly keeping and love:
Oh keep me from wasting, in folly and blindness,
Thy bountiful gifts, that may crown me above.

The gladness that comes with the sunlight of morning,
That shines in the dew that be-cry sta's the hills,
Is seen in the flowers the meadows adorning,
Is heard in the song that the mead ow-lark trills.

This gladness and sunshine and music and sweetness.
Oh grant me! let love all my being enthrall!
Then thought, word and action, in blessed completeness
Shall praise the Beneficent Giver of all.

THE HOUSEHOLD.

Housekeeping in Japan.

A lady writing from Japan says: "Housekeeping here has no trials. The worn and vexed spirits of American chatelains ought to rest in Japan after death. Capable and faithful servants are plenty and cheap. Our establishment boasts five, and for these we pay about what two would cost in New York. I do not visit my kitchen once a month, never give an order outside of a spoken wish, yet the domestic machinery moves with an ease and perfection unattainable at home by almost any effort on the part of the mistress. The manners of the servants are amusing, not to say startling, to an American accustomed to the cheerful familiarity of her native help. Every night at bedtime our five retainers appear, prostrate themselves in succession to the earth, and retire. This is to wish me good-night and to renew their testimony of profound respect and pleasure over the privilege of serving me. It was difficult at first to preserve the necessary dignity for the ceremony, but now I am as majestically gracious as any other potentate. The other day, on one of my rare visits to the kitchen, a hairpin became loosened and dropped without my notice. I had been seated in my own room only a few moments when my houseman entered, bearing a small salver, which he presented to me with many genuflections. Fancy my surprise to see a little hair-pin upon it, and to learn from my proud but embarassed servitor that it had fallen to the kitchen floor from my head. Afterward I found there had been a discussion as to who should pick it up, and almost a quarrel as to whom belonged the inestimable honor of bearing it to its owner!"

Household Hints.

Everybody has a cure for sore throat, but simple remedies appear to be more effectual. Salt and water is used by many as a gargle, but a little rum and honey dissolved in sage tea is better. An application of clothes wrung out in hot water and applied to the neck, changing as they begin toughen it. If gravy is not desired just add a bit of butter to the shaved meat and stir until all is heated; season, and it is ready to serve on a hot platter.

A delicious soft gingerbread is made by pouring on a piece of butter the size of a walnut a half teacupof hot water, adding, when the butter is well melted, one cup of molasses, one teaspoonful of soda, one teaspoonful of ginger, and sifted flour to make a thin batter. Bake in flat tins in slow oven. Is very nice eaten warm with butter.

COLD WATER CAKE.—One cup of sugar, one and a half cups of flour, half cup of cold water, two eggs, butter the size of an egg, one teaspoonful of cream of tartar, half teaspoonful of soda.

Unpleasant Camping Out.

On the plains of Afghanistan, in Central Asia, a joint commision of Englishmen and Russians is slowly laying down the boundary line which, it ishoped, will mark the farthest limit of Russian progress southward on the road toward the English possessions in India.

A correspondent who is with the commission writes to the London "Pioneer" an account of the cold weather which has been experienced. Those who have enjoyed the delights of campingout in the long summer vacation will perhaps shiver a little at this story of tent life in the valley of the Oxus:

On the night of the 23rd of December the thermometer went down to 2 deg. below zero. "One's breath froze into ice on one's pillow, and many of us found it difficult to sleep despite all the clothes we could pile on. I myself was awoke toward morning by a loud report, which I found was caused by the bursting of a bottle of what had been drinking water, but which had turned into a block of ice and burst under my bed, and once awake the cold was too intense to get to sleep again. At nine in the morning the thermometer was still only at 6 deg., and it continued to freeze all the day through, despite the sun. In the afternoon I was out shooting with the sun full on my face, yet my breath froze on my moustache the whole time. The poor cook, I think, had the hardest time of it. His eggs, he says, are all frozen hard, and he can make nothing of them; and further, as fast as he roasts his joint on one side it freezes, he says, on the other. I confess, though, that I did not witness the latter. Writing with ink, of course, is an utter impossibility—every ink pot in camp contains simply a solid block of ice, and it is no use in thawing it, as it freezes on the paper before it has time to dry. I am writing this, therefore, in pencil. It is wonderful how well the men and followers are standing the cold, but a liberal issue of meat and tea and sugar seems to make them all proof against any thing. I must say, though, that they are precious quiet in the mornings, and loath indeed to get up; their ablutions, too, I dare say, are few and far between, but really I cannot blame them. When it comes to our having to thaw our tooth-brush every time we have to use it, and when everything around is frozen hard, little wonder that the poor Hindu is chary of touching water. The bheesties, I think, I pity most. They can fill their mussucks certainly at the running canal, although even that is frozen over, but by the time they get back into camp the water they are carrying is frozen, and absolutely refuses to run out of the mussuck again.

THE LIME KILN CLUB.

Just previous to the opening of the meeting Elder Juneberry Davis and Judge Holdback Johnson got into a dispute as to whether the crow-bar belonged to the Glacial Epoch or the Drift Period, and after some hot words had passed the Elder punched the Judge on the nose and received a crack on the jaw in return. Brother Gardner came in as they were pulled apart, but he seemed to take no notice of the affair and nothing was said until the meeting opened. Then he looked around the hall and observed:

"If Elder Juneberry Davis an' Judge Holdback Johnson am in de hall to-night I should like to spoke a few remarks to 'em."

Both gentlemen walked forward to the platform with anxiety depicted on their faces, and the President continued:

"Elder Davis, when did dat Glacial Epoch take place?"

"I dunno, sah."

"Judge Holdback, what do you know bout de Drift Period?"

"I reckon dar' was a good deal o' driftin' aroun', sah."

"Yes, I s'pose dar' was. Didn't happen to drift any 'taters an' meat your way, did it?"

"Elder Davis, did dat Glacial Epoch pay up any of your back rent or git new shoes fur de chillen?"

"No, sah."

The Secretary announced the receipt of a Japanese newspaper called the Romaji Zasshi, published at Tokio. The proceedings of the Lime-Kiln Club at one of its January meetings was as follows:

solved in sage tea is better. An application of clothes wrung out in hot water and applied to the neck, changing as they begin to cool, has the most potency for removing inflammation of anything we ever tried. It should be kept up for a number of hours; during the evening is usually the most convenient time for applying this remedy.

A small piece of resin dipped in water which is placed in a vessel on a stove will add a peculiar property to the room, which will give great relief to persons troubled with a cough. The heat of the water is sufficient to throw off the aroma of the resin, and gives the same relief that is afforded by a combustion of resin. It is preferable to combustion, because the evaporation is more durable. The same resin may be used for weeks.

If you wish to clean your spice mill, grind a handful of raw rice in it. The particles of spice and pepper, or of coffee, will not adhere to it after the rice has passed through it.

Half a teaspoonful of common salt dissolved in a little cold water and drank will instantly relieve "heartburn," or dyspepsia. Dr. Vigorous recommends a glass of hot lemonade every hour or half-hour as an easy, agreeable, and efficient treatment for diarrhea. Never wash the feet in warm water except just before retiring cold water with a little ammon or salt dropped in is much pleasante and more healthful. Coarse brown pap r soaked n vinegar and placed on the forehead is good for a sick headache. If the eyelids are gently bathed in cool water the pain in the head is generally allayed.

Although it is a good plan sugar in canned fruit at time of sealing it is not necesary to keep it from spoiling. The essential thing is to exclude the air. Where this is not done the fruit will turn sour and the additional sugar will only make the vinous fermentation more active and thorough. The cans should be examined frequently, but without being much handled. Any that show loose covers or any mold on the top should be used before spoiling further.

Choice Recipes.

ROASTED PORK.—Separate each loin of the joint and make an incision into thick part of the meat in which to place the stuffing, made as follows: Mix one cup of bread-crumbs with one chopped onion, pepper, salt, sage, or summer savory, and one-fourth of a cup of hot water. Press into the meat, sew the edges together to keep it in place, and bake it in a quick oven.

A FARM DINNER IN FEBRUARY.—Boiled ham, boiled potatoes, hot corn bread, pickles, celery, buttermilk or cold water; no butter, no desert. Rule for corn bread: One quart of buttermilk, three eggs n thoroughly, three spoonfuls of mi e d shortening, a good pinch of salt, soda to neutralize the acid of the buttermilk (the quantity must be learned by experience), one cupful of flour, and cornmeal enough to make a rather stiff batter. Now I cannot say two or three cupfuls, for I do not know the size of the cups or the kind of meal you will use. By making corn bread of one kind several times in succession one learns how to proportion everything. Bake in a quick oven.

An excellent dish for breakfast or supper is made by shaving cold steak, or uncooked is just as good. Make a gravy by dusting into the hot spider a tablespoonful of flour and one of butter; when this browns, pour about a cupful of water frem the teakettle, stirring briskly the while; this is now ready for the shaved beef, which will only require to be heated through, as boiling will

STODDARD'S RUIN.

A Story of How It Broke Ferryman Dagget's Business.

Many years ago down in Idaho, during a gold excitement, a good many men went into the country to make money outside the gold hunting industry. Their idea was to make the old fellows delve for the gold while they appropriated it afterward. Rollin Daggett, afterwards Nevada's congressman, says the Carson (Nev) Appeal, established a ferryboat on a small creek and named the place "Death's Ford," at the same time inventing a musty legend to the effect that it was thus named because so many lives had been lost in the attempt to cross it. The stream was not over a dozen yards wide and the water nowhere over two feet deep, but he rigged up a flatboat and pulled it back and forth by a rope contrivance. Whenever prospectors crossed he regaled them with horrible tales of the treachery of the stream, and the remorseless quicksands which had drawn so many men and mules to terrible deaths.

In the night when he ferried people over he would caution them not to get too near the edge of the boat, as a fall overboard was certain death. By letting the dim old lantern go out and making slow time he frequently impressed the passengers with the idea that the stream was half a mile wide; For night trips he charged $5, but if the wind was high and the weather bad he struck sanguine prospecters for much larger sums. In the daytime $1 was his modest charge.

He went along in this way for several months, the men who rushed to the hills looking upon him as the benefactor to his race by this conquering of so formidable an obstacle to travel as "Death's Ford." One day Charlie Stoddard, the prometer, appeared on the bank with a mule and boarded the flatboat to cross. In the midst of the stream, just when the ferryman was telling how dangereus the place was, the mule grew restless and fell overboard. One leg caught on a rope and he got his head under water, and, unable to extricate himself, was drowned. When he was cut loose he lay there in the middle of "Death's Ford" half out of water so that all who came along saw what a miserable sham the ferry was, and that any four-footed animal could walk across. Daggett tried to get the mule away but he was too heavy to budge, and so he lay there in sight for weeks, until Daggett's business as ferryman was ruined. That's the reason old Dag hardly ever speaks to Charlie Stoddard when he meets him.

Celestials in British Columbia.

The Victorians have a very sharp way of dealing with the cheap labor difficulty. No vessel is allowed to bring to port more than one John Chinaman for every hundred tons of its size. Consequently a ship of fourteen hundred tons would only be allowed to carry fourteen of the heathen ones. We have just seen in a file of Victorian papers that a vessel of that size was found to have fifty Chinamen on board, and the captain was mulcted in a penalty of $500. Every Chinaman coming to Victoria has to take out papers of naturalization and pay a poll tax. But the cute Celestials post their naturalization papers to their friends in China, who come over with them, and thus escape the tax.

DON'T KNOW HIM.

A communication from Talbot, Mich., stated that:

"About four weeks ago a colored man struck this town who gave his name as Gen Mentgomery Scott, and claimed to be a member of the Lime Kiln Club and a cousin of the King of Dahomey. The General was selling what he termed 'Scott's Death to Corns,' together with a cream tooth paste. With every box or bottle sold for twenty-five cents he gave a photograph of Brother Gardner. He was here about two weeks, and then suddenly skipped. Among the thirty or forty colored people who purchased his corn-salve every single man has been rendered a cripple; those who used the tooth-paste find their teeth ready to fall out. You will soon receive a visit from a Talbot lawyer, who will be authorized to settle this case with your club for the sum of $40,000. We are good-natured and long-suffering, but we propose to put a stop to this sort of business.

The Secretary said that he had carefully consulted the rolls, but had failed to find the name of Gen. Scott thereon. It was likely that he was one of the dozen impostors traveling around the country and using the name of the club to further their ends.

CHARTER GRANTED.

A petition signed by sixty-four colored residents of Lunenburg, N. S., set forth the following facts:

1. They sighed for intellectual progression.

2. They had no place to hang out o' nights.

3 They felt that they could do the whole continent good.

4. Their watchword was: "De Taller Candle Nebber Explodes."

And they would humbly petition that authority be granted them to organize a Lime Kiln Club, and a charter granted them to work to the thirty-first degree.

The petition was recommended by the Warden and Counsellors of Lunenburg County, together with Capt. A. J Wolf, S. Watson Oxner, F. B. Wade, Dr. C. C. Aitken and James Dowling. On motion of Judge Chewso the petition was granted and the Secretary instructed to forward the charter.

NOT CARRIED.

Waydown Bebee then offered the following preamble and resolution:

"Whereas, Medical science has demonstrated de fack dat de habit of drinkin' ice-water has a tendency to bring on heart disease, lumbage, liver complaint, insomnia and Mr. Bright's disease; now darfore

"Resolved, Dat dis Lime-Kiln Club not only abstains from ice-water doorin' de comin' summer, but it advises de cull'd people of dis kentry to do de same thing."

Prof. Ambidexter Smith, Giveadam Jones, Samuel Shin and Sir John Skinner opposed the resolution, while Elder Toots, Whalebone Howker, Cæsar Johnston and others favored it, and upon a vote being taken a tie was the result. Brother Gardner said he did not care to take the responsibility of a decision on his shoulders, and suggested as a compromise that Sundown Davis be submitted to a series of experiments from May to October to determine the matter. The suggestion was accepted and the resolution withdrawn.

MILITARY REPORT.

Col. Erastus White, of the Committee on Military Affairs, reported that his committee had carefully investigated the subject of defenses, as required by a late resolution and had reached the following conclusion:

1 In case of war the enemy's fleet could easily bombard any city on the coast. We would therefore suggest that all these cities be moved back fourteen mile.

2. The enemy would have no trouble in landing troops on our shores. The only trouble would be in getting any off them alive again. The only suggestion we have to offer is that Ben Butler be notified to be on hand early in the morning.

3 If a new Paradise Hall be erected it should be placed at least twelve miles from any spot accessible to the gun-boats.

4. We don't want a war, but if one happens to fall out of a tree and hit us we shan't run away.

5. It is better to apologize than to get licked. This advice is for such nations as may feel like knocking the chip off our shoulder.

The report was accepted and adopted, and all unfinished business being placed on a shelf to dry, the meeting adjourned.

Awful Sufferings of Four Canadian Fishermen in an Open Boat.

Full details of the terrible story of cannibalism have been obtained from only one of the survivors who is able to speak of the affair. The boat landed at Louisburg, N. S., the other afternoon, with two exhausted survivors. A ghastly sight met the gaze of the crowd that assembled about the boat when from beneath the piece of canvas covering them in the stern were brought to light the remains of James McDonald and Angus McDonald. The former was in a frightfully mutilated condition. The right arm was missing from the elbow, the throat was cut and hacked in a sickening manner and two great pieces of flesh had been chopped, as by a knife, from each thigh. In the bottom of the boat in a pool of blood, which washed to and fro with the motion of the waves, lay three that had been bitten, partly masticated and then spat out. The spectacle was of a nature witnessed but once in a lifetime, and the feelings of those looking on were so wrought with horror that the strongest in the crowd turned away, unable to stand it any longer. The two half-perished survivors of the terrible voyage are Colin Chisholm, of Harbor Bouche, N. S., and Angus McEachern, of Long Point, Strait of Canso Chisholm told the following story: "We belonged to the American fishing schooner Cisely H. Low, Captain McKenzie. The vessel had fourteen hands altogether, and sailed from Gloucester on Wednesday March 15. After a fair passage we arrived on the Western banks on the succeeding Tuesday. On the Monday following, about eight o'clock in the morning, McEachern and myself left the vessel to attend to our trawls in company with another dory containing the two McDonalds. While at our work fog suddenly shut down, hiding the vessel from our view. As soon as the trawls were all set we started to find the schooner, and in trying to do so fell in with the other boat. No answer came to our signals and we concluded

WE WERE LOST

We kept in company all day and night and until noon of the following day, when the McDonalds got into our dory and we set the other adrift after securing her oars. We observed a sail but could not attract their attention. We had neither food nor water and began to suffer awfully. On Thursday evening James McDonald, who was more thinly clad than the rest and had been gradually growing weaker and weaker from hunger and exposure, felt that he was dying, and looking at the three of us from the stern where he was lying, said in a voice I shall never forget, 'Good by! good by, mates! I am dying." These were his last words. We kept his body, thinking the rest of us might yet be rescued. We kept on in the direction we thought the land lay, though every stroke was weaker than the last, and none knew at what moment one of us would give up in despair. On Friday, after James McDonald died, Angus McDonald said he was starving and thirsty, and that as he must have something to eat and drink he was going

He had no sooner uttered the words than he seized his knife and cut off Jim's arm; sucking some of the blood and eating some of the flesh. A German scientist Herr Luders, of Gerlitz, has invented a "photographic hat." It is a hat which contains a small but complete photographic apparatus. There is a minute opening in front of the hat in which is a lens. By pulling a string the wearer can at any time take an instantaneous photograph of any object he wishes.

The Presbyterion Church at Loch Kanza, Arran, Scotland, finds it hard to get the kind of a minister it wants. The last candidate was dismissed in short order because he walked with a frivolous gait. The elders said that his conversation was all right, but his walk was decidedly heretical.

A royal battle took place between a bull and a buck, the latter weighing over 200 pounds, on the farm of the Hon. Oscar Turner in Ballard county, Kentucky. The two were found dead. The bull had received three thrusts from the horns of the buck, the last being through the heart.

Justice of Peace Kurganowski, of the Province of Perm, in Russia, while holding court, was twice interrupted by his wife, once with the announcement that dinner was ready, and again that the soup was getting cold, whereupon he fined her three roubles for disturbing the dignity of his court, and then paid the money from his own pocket.

Sir Richard Garth, the chief justice of Bengal, has left India. Ill health has compelled him to retire from the department a year before the completion of the usual term. Sir Richard Garth was held in high esteem. He was regarded as an able and excellent judge, and it is proposed by some leading native neblemen of his service to provide a prominent memorial of him in Calcutta.

Sealing-wax was quite the rage with fashionable letter-writers six months and even three months ago, but ultra-fashionable women use it no longer. The rage for decorating the backs of envelopes with huge blots of red, blue, black, or green wax, in which was impressed a monogram or initial

"In India," said a gentleman with an Oriental tan on his face, "the customs with regard to the servants are somewhat peculiar. When a man is invited to a dinner party, or is sitting at the table in his boarding-house, his own 'bearer,' or body servant, stands behind his chair to wait upon him. The exigencies of the feast often make it necessary for a bearer to serve somebody other than his master, but on such occasions the guest is expected to overlook any shortcomings of which the attendant may be guilty; for in India the rule, 'Insult my servant, and you insult me,' is acknowledged everywhere. Once at a boarding-house on the Chouringee road, in Calcutta, I saw a bearer who was serving a stout, choleric Englishman with curry, spill a little of the copper-colored mixture on his trousers. Furiously turning around, the angry Briton found that the delinquent was not his own bearer, but the employee of a gentleman sitting at the other side of the table. 'Well, sir,' he said this vis-a-vis, 'I won't kick your servant, but, by gad, sir, I'll kick my own!" and an astonished and innocent bearer, who was twenty feet away when the offence was committed, was ignominiously kicked out of the room."

Four Years of Faithful Service.

"Patrick, are you sure you can handle a pair of horses if they're a little vicious?"

"Be gorra, I can, sur."

"How long were you in your last place?"

"Four years, sur."

"That speaks well for you. You don't drink?"

"Whaisky, do you mean? Sure, niver a drop passed my lips durin' all that time, sur."

"Good for you, Patrick. Oh, by the by, where were you during those four years?"

"I was in jail, sur."

Phillips Brooks, of Boston, when rector of a church in Philadelphia some years ago, received so many pairs of slippers from his devoted young lady parishioners that he was popularly called the clerical centipede.

...SE AND BUSTLE ABOUT?

a piece of flesh in his hand, he asked me if I would have some, remarking at the time that the blood tasted like cream, I tasted it, and at once spat it out, saying if I was to die within an hour I would neither eat the flesh or drink the blood. In the afternoon Angus again turned to me and said:—'I am going to cut Jim's throat to get some more blood.' I begged him not to do so, saying:—"For God's sake, whatever else you do, don't cut his throat. Do what you like, but don't do that." In the morning we found he had cut the dead man's throat, and, not finding any blood there, had also cut pieces of flesh out of his left thigh. His hunger and thirst not being then appeased, Angus cut another piece of flesh out of Jim's right thigh and during Saturday

ATE SEVERAL PIECES.

Mr. McEachern attempted to eat some, but could not. The taste made him sick. On Saturday night, "having kept rowing, we met a quantity of drift ice and we were then, I should judge, sixty miles east southeast of Guyon Island. By this time Angus McDonald, I noticed, was becoming crazy and going aft to try to get him to lay down, he picked up an oar and struck me twice, but not hurting me much. Sometime afterward McEachern and myself lay down to sleep. At daylight we awoke, to find that Angus McDonald had thrown all the oars overboard. We took the thwarts and paddled through the ice searching for the oars, and at last found five of them. All day Sunday we rowed through the ice as best our weakness would permit us. About noon never having spoken after striking me the previous day. As evening drew near we made out what afterwards proved to be Guyon Island, but darkness coming on and squalls setting in we were then unable to find it. We lay down to sleep but cold and anxiety to reach land made sleep impossible. All night long the waves beat over us, and when dawn broke at last we were covered with ice and hardly able to move, but land was now close by, and by strenuous efforts we managed to make gradual headway. About ten o'clock on Monday morning our dory grounded on the beach of the island, and the lighthouse keeper, who had observed us through the ice, came down with his two boys and carried us up to his house. Neither of us was able to walk when we were assisted to land; the feet of both of us had turned purple and raw and were horribly swollen. After we got into the ice we used to suck it to allay our thirst, and that was the only thing we had in the shape of water for over eight days. Now it is all over, and I am very thankful to God for having been preserved."

ANGUS LIED INSANE,

A Snake Story.

For six months a young man named Ferguson, who resided at Great Falls, has been in failing health, despite the care of his physicians. Among many odd symptoms was that of a peculiar choking sensation, which was not understood until one day a snake thrust its head out of the young man's mouth. The sick man called his sister, and she, wrapping a cloth around her hand, when next the hissing head appeared, seized it, and with a quick pull landed the venomous reptile at her feet. Her action killed her brother. The tail of the snake had grown into the young man's body, and in tearing it away a blood vessel was broken, and the young man bled to death.

If your biography is to be written, my son, do the work yourself. If somebody else should write it he might accidentally wander into truth now and then and spoil the whole thing. A biography is valuable in indirect ratio to the amount of truth it contains.

even three months ago, but ultra-fashionable women use it no longer. The rage for decorating the backs of envelopes with huge blots of red, blue, black, or green wax, in which was impressed a monogram or initial, spread among women generally. So fashion has now tabooed it and has returned to the habit of using ready-gummed envelopes.

An Alabama newspaper seriously tells its readers that 4-year-old Dillie Welsh and a small Jersey calf are great friends. One day Dillie went to an unused well and peeped over the low curb. The calf saw her, and seized her dress in its mouth. The little girl lost her balance and fell over the curb, but the calf haug on, and for half an hour held her thus suspended until the child was rescued. Then the calf was very happy.

Of late years many valuable products have been got out of coal-tar. Sir Lyon Playfair announced lately in Liverpool, that it has been discovered that a crystal can be extracted from it, an almost imperceptible amount of which will fully sweeten a considerable quantity of solid or liquid food, and that this new sweetener has the advantage over sugar of passing so rapidly away from the digestive organs, that it neither fattens those who take it nor encourages rheumatism. This will be good news to the disciples of Banting who still have a hankering after sugar.

In acquiring Burmah, England has got possession of vast forests of teak, which, never plentiful in India, was becoming commercially very rare. Of all the woods grown in the East this is the most valuable. It is neither too heavy nor too hard; it does not warp or split under exposure to heat and dampness; it contains an essential oil which prevents its rotting under wet conditions, and at the same time acts as a preservative to iron and repels the destructive white ants; it is, withal, a handsome wood, of several varieties of colour and grain and takes a good polish.

The Lancashire pit-brow girls do not want to be forbidden from working at the pit-brows. They say that they wear trousers because they are more convenient, that they are more healthy than factory girls, and that their work does not demoralize or unsex them, because they are neither demoralized nor unsexed. The Vicar of Pemberton, who has taken up their cause, threatens to bring up 500 of these girls in a special train, and put them in evidence before the House of Commons. If the girls like their work, why should they be legislated out of it?

He said: "Gentlemen of the jury, charging a jury is a new business to me, as this is my first case. You have heard all the evidence, as well as myself; you have also heard what the learned counsel have said. If you believe what the counsel for the plaintiff has told you your verdict will be for the plaintiff; but if, on the other hand, you believe what the defendant's counsel has told you, then you will give a verdict for the defendant. But if you are like me, and don't believe what either of them have said, then I'll be hanged if I know what you will do. Constable, take charge of the jury."

An Unemployed World.

A fond husband was monkeying around the cook, who said, indignantly:

"Go way wid yer. I heard yez tell yer ould woman the other day that she was all the wurld to yez."

"That's so, Biddy, but you know there are two worlds—the old world and the new world."

—Would it not be well for our town fathers to have our sidewalks put into proper shape? At present they are in some places disgraceful. A general tidying up would not be out of place. EXPRESS last week as occurring at Tamworth had a most fortunate and miraculous termination. The facts as related were true but strange to say the men were not much injured. —An exchange says there is a tendency among its correspondents towards gossip. It applies to THE EXPRESS fellows as well. This we do not want. It is news we are after. The public as a rule do not care whether a couple is well or ill mated, or whether Jabez Aaron Kalbfleisch climbed the fence, cleared it, or crawled through and drew the dog after him. If Wesley Morley Punsheon Spultherick was off on a bender night 'fore last, it's no one's business but his own, and the village gossip's. A. Augustus Spindlemasher may have escorted Miss Cora Annette Pileton home on Sunday evening and had a foot race with old Pileton's brindle pup, still the matter is of no interest to any but himself and the village tailor. Parson Skyclaver has a perfect right to pay his attention to Miss Angelica Hymnscreecher, if she and the old folks are satisfied and he means business, without the matter being ventilated in the local paper. Let's have the news.

—"The Other Side of the Story" is the title of a well got up pamphlet containing a series of reviews criticizing Mr. J. C. Dent's "Story of the Upper Canadian Rebellion." It also contains the letters which appeared in the Toronto press in the Mckenzie-Rolph controversy. These are connected together with a short accounnt of the controversy, and are followed by a lengthy critique on "The New Story" by Mr. John King, M. A., Barrister, Berlin, who also contributes an Introductory. The publication of the pamphlet is justified on the ground that the promise given the public that the Story of the Rebellion would be written from a "Liberal but non-partisan point of view" has not been kept. Mr. King's critique is a slashing and racy review by a Liberal, of Mr. Dent's narrative and, without being so avowedly, is a strong vindication of the character and career of William Lyon Mackenzie. Those who have read the "Story" should certainly read this reply, and those who have not read it may, with great advantage, read what the critics say about it. The price of the pamphlet is 25 cents. It may be had at the bookstores —Mrs. Davy is removing to her island this week. She will be ready to receive patrons in a short time.

Napanee Lit Up by Electric Light.

The long-talked of and anxiously-watched for electric light is now in complete operation, and to the satisfaction of every one. The dynamo, a Thompson-Huston machine made by the Royal Electric Light Co., of Montreal, is located in the Big Mill, the power being furnished by the immense water wheel in that building. The operations of the company have been in charge of Mr. Badger, an expert electrician who thoroughly understands his business. After Mr. Badger'departure the machine will be managed by Mr. Dafoe, of the mill, Mr. F. F. Miller will also assist. The light was first put in operation Monday night, and though at first there was a slight flickering noticeable, it gadually wore off and left the light strong and steady as possible. The following stores are lighted:—Perry & Co., A. W. Grange & Bro., P. Slaven & Co., S. McLaughlin, Jas. H. Downey, A. Rose & Co., Hinch & Co., (two lights,) Downey & Co., (two lights,) and the Campbell House billiard room. Wednesday night a light was suspended from a cable in front of the Brisco House. This was a piece of private enterprise, a number of merchants in the vicinity "chipping in" and making up the requisite amount. The streets were crowded with citizens viewing the "electric light" and all expressed extreme satisfaction. Each light is of 2,000 candle power, and one jet is sufficient to illuminate the largest store in town. The company have contracted for 20 lights already, and no doubt as soon as these can be supplied, more will be ready. Indeed the success of the undertaking is assured, and our merchants should see to it that they do all in their power to aid the enterprise.

—Rev. Mr. Emsley suffered from a severe cold last Sunday. In the morning he was obliged to curtail his sermon by hoarseness, and in the evening he was relieved at intervals during the delivery of his sermon by anthems from the choir. The pieces were arranged appropriately to strengthen the sermon, and the service, though unusual, was most enjoyable. The choir, under the able supervision of Mrs. Yorke, of Toronto, has made marked progress in their singing of late. Mrs. Yorke is an excellent teacher.

A Sudden Demise.

On Thursday morning at 5:15 Francis A., beloved wife of Mr. J. J. Perry, druggist, aged 33 yrs., 7 months and 20 days, breathed her last at the family residence on Dundas street west. Deceased was of weakly constitution and received a fright the night of the fire, May 5th. She was prostrated for a day or two, but rallied and seemed to be on the highway to recovery, when an accidental fall caused a relapse, and despite the best efforts of medical skill and loving attendants she rapidly grew worse. Wednesday evening a change for the better was noticed, the patient becoming quite cheerful and carrying on a conversation with those about her. Hopes of ultimate recovery were entertained until about an hour before her death, when a sudden and fatal relapse set in which terminated fatally at 5.15. Deceased was cheerful and resigned to the last, and died peacefully and without a struggle in the midst of the conversation. Mr. Perry has our symyathy and that of a host of friends in his sad bereavement. The funeral takes place to-day (Friday) at 3.30 P. m.

Important Meeting of the Board of Trade.

A meeting of the Board of Trade has been called for next Monday evening to discuss several questions of vital importance to the merchants of our town.

The action of the hotel-keepers in charging for shed room will be brought up and if thought advisable the question of free sheds under the control of the Board will be proposed.

It is likely that the Post Office question will be further discussed. The matter of the proposed extension of the N. T. & Q. Ry., will be brought before the meeting. It is presumed that something definite will have then been heard from Ottawa as the Railway Committee deal with this question to-day. Mr. D. H. Preston is at present in Ottawa and with Mr. Pruyn will oppose the bill in Committee.

The proposed waterworks scheme will also be investigated from a financial stand point.

We trust that every effort will be put forth to secure a first class water system for our town. Now that we are on the upward move let us not weary in well doing, but let us deserve the reputation we now have of being the most enterprising town in Ontario.

Fowls prefer, as well as need, good pure, cold water, especially in warm, sultry weather.

Young chickens may be allowed the run of the garden, the mother being cooped, and the havoc they make among insects is an excellent thing.

Inflammation of the egg organs is generally caused by overfeeding. Eating the seeds of grapes, or grain affected with ergot, is said to produce this inflammation. Symptoms: the hen going into the nest without laying; having a straddling gait; laying shelless eggs; dropping eggs from the perch or elsewhere. Treatment: one grain of calomel and one-twelfth of a grain of tartar emetic, given in oat or barley meal. If necessary, a second dose may be given.

When a dealer wishes to add a knock-down argument to all he has said about the merits of the breed of fowls he has for sale, he urges that their flesh is of extra quality, Now there is no breed of fowls under the sun, the chickens of which, if well fed all their lives, will not be tender, juicy and toothsome if killed before they are too old. And there is no breed that will be plump, tender and fit for the table unless fed thus. Mind, we do not say that there is no difference at all in breeds, but we say, that of the two things, the breed and feeding, the latter is most important.

The white of an egg has proved to be the most efficacious remedy for burns. Seven or eight successive applications of this substance will soothe the pain and effectually exclude the burn from the air. This simple remedy seems preferable to collodion, or even cotton. Extraordinary stories are told of the healing properties of a new oil, which is easily made from the yolks of hens' eggs. The eggs are first boiled hard, and the yolks are then removed, crushed and placed over a fire, where they are carefully stirred until the whole substance is just on the point of catching fire, when the oil separates and may be poured off. One yelk will yield nearly two teaspoonfuls of oil. It is in general use in South Russia as a means of curing cuts, bruises and scratches.

I think the lime-dust treatment the best of all cures for gapes in chickens. It is cheap, simple and effective. I put a whole breed of chickens in a peck measure with a bag over the top. A barrel partly filled with air-slaked lime, as dry as powder, was turned on its side and the lime was stirred with a stick until the whole barrel was filled with lime floating in the air. The chickens were put in this, with the bag over the mouth of the barrel. They were put into the dust three times, not more than a minute each time. They should be kept in the measure all the time. We let one breed stay in too long and lost five out of seven. The windpipes of the dead chickens were found more than half filled with gape worms, which made it more difficult for them to breathe. My little son, seven years old, treats his chickens in this way successfully. The lime can be slaked with water and then allowed to dry so as to powder. A lot of lime thus prepared will last for years for this purpose.

THE CAREFUL FARMER.

Some gentlemen from the city went out in the country on a fishing trip recently, and a rain coming up suddenly they pulled their boat ashore and went to a barn near a farm house to get in out of the wet. They found the farmer in the barn sitting on an upturned half bushel, whittling a cob, waiting for the rain to cease so he could go out and kill potato bugs. He bowed to the men as they came in, and sat their fishing tackle down, though he eyed them pretty closely. He didn't talk much, but answered their questions politely. They asked all about the farming business, and he told them how things were running. Finally he said:

"I suppose you are gentlemen from the city, come out here for recreation, but I didn't know at first but you might have some scheme to get me to buy something, or make me agent for some patent, or that you wanted to get me to sign some paper that would seem innocent enough, but which would turn out to be a note that I would have to pay. There's sharks around here every few days trying to pick up farmers, and we have to keep our eyes and ears about us. I am satisfied I have made a mistake in you, gentlemen, so I apologize."

The gentlemen laughed at his fears, but accepted his apology, and finally asked him what course the sharpers usually took to beat a farmer.

"O, they take every kind of a course," said he, as he took another cob to whittle. "Anything to get a man to sign his name. Once a farmer's name is on paper, and they get it on to a promissory note, and into the hands of an innocent party. I had a man come along here two years ago, with a patent churn, and he left it for my wife to try. She tried it, and liked it, and wanted to buy it, but he wouldn't sell it. He said he was just getting it patented, and he wanted a few of the the best farmers to try it, and make any suggestions they thought of to improve it, and he would make the improvements and get it patented. He said when it was patented, and was a success, he had just as soon make my wife a present of a churn, but he shouldn't sell any, as he should put it in the hands of some large factory to build, and he would get a royalty. He wanted a few letters from those who had tried the churn, to send to our member of congress, who had promised to go to the patent office for him. He wrote out a letter to our member of congress, saying that I believed there was merit in the churn, and I signed it. How the deuce he got my name off of that letter, and put it at the bottom of a note for two hundred and fifty dollars, I don't know, but I had to pay the note, and my wife has never got the churn. But the slickest thing that farmers ever got took in on was Bohemian oats. About ten years ago a man came along with a baking powder can full of oats without any hulls on—just the plain meat of the oats. He said he was an agent of the German government, and that one farmer in every township could buy a bushel of the oats for five dollars, if he would contract not to sell the crop of hull-less oats to anybody but the authorized agent, and he was to agree to pay four dollars a bushel. The idea was to create a monopoly in hull less oats. He just mentioned it to me, he said, that I might think it over, and in the meantime he would make some inquiries as to my standing. Well, for a week I dreamed of nothing but Bohemian oats, and by the time he came around again I was as ripe as the oats, and I wanted ten bushels. He said he would have to communicate with the general office before he could sell me more than one bushel, but he didn't know

"COME IN WILLIAM."

A Charitable Head Agent's Little Scheme.

In 1866, which was almost before the Canada Pacific Railroad was thought of, the writer of this was encamped on Beaver River, in the Canadian North-West well up in the foothills of the Rockies. Six of us, who were prospecting, hunting, and taking things pretty easy for July weather, occupied a large cabin which had been built and deserted some time before. From this central point small parties branched out and were gone for several days at a time. We had no trouble with anything or anybody until, after we had occupied the place seventeen or eighteen days, a bad spell of weather came on and drove all the detached parties in for shelter. We were well heeled in the matter of firearms, and there was something like among the six. For cook we had an old soldier who had been discharged from the regular army after long service.

One morning, it being the third day of the bad weather, and the rain still falling, Joe, our cook, went down to the forks of the Beaver to meet a canoe which we expected up with provisions. The door of the cabin was shut, and there was a bit of fire on the hearth at which some of the men were moulding bullets, and over which a kettle of pork and beans was boiling. Two of the gang were playing cards, and a third was reading, while I was examining some mineral specimens. In this state of affairs the door softly opened, and in walked a young man about 23 years of age. He was smooth-faced, red-cheeked, and had such a smile on his phiz that the sight of him would have set anyone to grinning. He looked from one to the other, as if to make sure that all were present, and then stepped back and opened the door and called.

"Come in, William, they are at home."

A short, stout, ugly-faced man of forty pushed his way in, shut the door, and stood with his back to it. That he was a hard pill no one could doubt after looking into his face; that he meant business was apparent from his having a revolver in either hand. Had

SOME ONE YELLED "INDIANS!"

I think the six of us, each with a revolver ready to shoot, would have been out doors in twenty seconds. Here we all sat as dumb as oysters and as helpless as snails, for we realized that it was a "stand up."

"Now, gents," said the young man shewing his white teeth as he smiled, "I want to raise a few hundred dollars for an orphan asylum in the States. I shall expect each one of you to contribute. If any gentleman should so far forget himself as to pull his gun, my friend William, who shoots both-handed, will promptly attend to his case."

It was only after this little speech that we fully comprehended what was going on' William kept every man of us under his eye' with his two pistols ready for service, and we were cowed. I knew that the average man will feel contempt for us and assert that he would have done this or that had he been one of the six, but he is mistaken. Under like circumstances, unless he was a fool, he would have tamely submitted. That red-cheeked boy, as we were not long in concluding, was a road agent named Col. Lee, and the man William had justly earned the general office before he could sell me more than one bushel, but he didn't know but the could arrange it so I could have a county right, and be the only man in the county who could raise the oats. He said he hated to let one man have such a chance to get rich, but he had struck three or four farmers that had no standing, and he wouldn't let them have a kernel of the oats for love or money, and as he had got to go to Iowa soon he might give me the county, but I must not say anything about it. He would be back in a week, and by that time he would know if I could have the county. He might have let me have the earth, if he had waited another week. Well, to make a long story short, I bought fifty bushels of oats, signed a contract to sell to nobody but him, and I got two farmers to sign with me as security, and the next spring I sowed the oats."

"What did you get?" asked one of the fishermen, as he looked out of the barn door, and found that the rain had cleared off.

"Get!" said the farmer, as he rose up and kicked the half bushel measure across the barn. "I got a fair crop of common oats, with hulls on, which I sold from the thrashing machine for twenty cents a bushel The oats he sold me were common oats, with the hulls taken off, and I paid him five dollars a bushel for them in cash, and the contract I signed, turned out to be a note for five hundred dollars, endorsed by twe of the best farmers in town, and I paid it."

"Well, he spoke the truth when he said he di in't like to see one man get too rich," said one of the fishermen, "but I should have supposed he would have come round the next year and bought your crops, as he promised. But I suppose you violated your contract by selling the oats to other parties."

"Come around again," said the farmer. "He would have been lynched. Why I found that he had sold Bohemian oats to over fifty farmers in this township, and in the county I don't know how many farmers took the bait. You can't imagine how I felt, after hugging that secret to my heart all summer, and watching the oats grew, to see them head out just like ordinary oats, and when it came over me that I had been sold, and was not going to be rich, but poorer than ever, I was actually sick for a month. The doctors called it nervous prostration, but it was Bohemian oats fever, hat's what it was."

"Come, gents, time is money with us," said the Colonel as we sat staring at him. "Here's my cap, who chips in the first hundred?"

He held it toward me, and I dropped in four twenties, which was all I had. The next man came down with $200; the next with $150, and by the time the last had contributed the Colonel had $800 in his cap. In transfering it to his pocket he counted the money, and as he put his cap on his head he said:

"This will go a good way toward making the little orphans happy. I don't want anything else, gentlemen, and we will now take our leave. I would advise you not to follow, though of course you can act your own pleasure. I wish you good morning."

The two backed out and shut the door, which swung out instead of in. Scarcely had it closed before we made a rush, but they were still too smart for us. They had braced a log against it, and there was only one window in the house. Before anyone had volunteered to crawl out of that the two fellows had made good their escape.

In going away they met our cook on his way back, and the Colonel handed him a flask of whiskey and asked him to present it to us with his compliments. We took the trail and pursued it for several hours, but we had seen the last of them.

A Faithful Animal.

A very strange and pathetic occurrence has just come under observation at Tiffin. Last October little Freddy Luiz, son of Mr. and Mrs. Luiz of Tiffin, was taken suddenly ill and died. He was a kind and loving boy, and had for a pet a little terrier dog, to which he was very kind. After his death the dog showed signs of great grief, crying and howling piteously. Since the death of their loved son the parents have regularly visited his grave and strewed flowers and dropped tears upon the little mound. The dog always accompanied them, and at the grave would show unmistakable signs of grief. A few days ago the family visited the grave and the dog did not return home with them. Late in the evening the superintendent of the cemetery, Mr. Clouser, saw the dog lying on his young master's grave howling piteously and tried to drive him away, but he would not go. He laid there until the middle of the next day, when he was finally driven away with great effort.

"Why, how is that?"

"I forgot to bring a pea-jacket with me.

In the Good Old Colony Times.

(From the Pennsylvania Gazette of 1729.)

Some time since six convicted servants, viz, four white men, one white woman, and one mulatto man, living with several masters on Rappahanneck River, combined together to run away, and accordingly stole a boat, went down the river to the bay, and proceeded to the mouth of York River, where they met with an old man and his boy in a small sloop going to carry corn from one part of the bay to another. They forced the man and boy to surrender the sloop and gave them the boat which they had. Then they proceeded in the sloop toward New York, but, by their unskilfulness in navigation and contrary winds, they were kept out so long that they were almost perished with hunger. At length they were met by Capt. Long in his Majesty's ship the——. The convicts told the Captain a formal story that they sailed from London in a ship bound for these ports, but were unfortunately met with by pirates on this coast, who took them and their ship, stripped them of all, and turned them (poor creatures) adrift in that little sloop, &c. The Captain had compassion on them, took them on board, ordered them to be better clothed and fed, and so proceeded toward Virginia. Meantime one of the man-of-war's sailors, rummaging their little sloop, found some screws and rollers, who immediately informed the Captain of it, and told him that as these things were used in no other country than Virginia or Maryland for rolling tobacco, he believed these people were runaways from thence, and had imposed falsehoods on him. The Captain thereupon ordered one of them (a young man of better countenance than the rest) to be brought to him, who, upon examination, confessed the whole story of their running away, and taking the poor old man's sloop from him. They were secured, and when the ship arrived in Virginia were delivered up to justice, committed to prison, and were last week tried at this city by a Court of Admiralty, were found guilty of piracy, and all six received sentence of death. His Honour the Governeur, through his own clemency and the intercession of Capt. Long, has been pleased to reprieve the young man above mentioned, and one other, and the rest, viz., two white men, one white woman, and a mulatto man, are to be executed in a few days, and two of them hung in chains, viz., one at Rappahannock River, near the place whence they ran, and the other at York River, near the place where they committed the piracy. This account we thought proper to publish, in hopes it may be a means to deter others from such wicked courses, lest they should fall under the like unhappy circumstances.

In the Good Old Colony Times.

(From the Pennsylvania Gazette of 1789.)

Sometime since six convicted servants, viz, four white men, one white woman, and one mulatto man, living with several masters on Rappahanneck River, combined together to run away, and accordingly stole a boat, went down the river to the bay, and proceeded to the mouth of York River, where they met with an old man and his boy in a small sloop going to carry corn from one part of the bay to another. They forced the man and boy to surrender the sloop and gave them the boat which they had. Then they proceeded in the sloop toward New York, but, by their unskilfulness in navigation and contrary winds, they were kept out so long that they were almost perished with hunger. At length they were met by Capt. Long in his Majesty's ship the——. The convicts told the Captain a formal story that they sailed from London in a ship bound for these ports, but were unfortunately met with by pirates on this coast, who took them and their ship, stripped them of all, and turned them (poor creatures) adrift in that little sloop, &c. The Captain had compassion on them, took them on board, ordered them to be better clothed and fed, and so proceeded toward Virginia. Meantime one of the man-of-war's sailors, rummaging their little sloop, found some screws and rollers, who immediately informed the Captain of it, and told him that as these things were used in no other country than Virginia or Maryland for rolling tobacco, he believed these people were runaways from thence, and had imposed falsehoods on him. The Captain thereupon ordered one of them (a young man of better countenance than the rest) to be brought to him, who, upon examination, confessed the whole story of their running away, and taking the poor old man's sloop from him. They were secured, and when the ship arrived in Virginia were delivered up to justice, committed to prison, and were last week tried at this city by a Court of Admiralty, were found guilty of piracy, and all six received sentence of death. His Honour the Governeur, through his own clemency and the intercession of Capt. Long, has been pleased to reprieve the young man above mentioned, and one other, and the rest., viz., two white men, one white woman, and a mulatto man, are to be executed in a few days, and two of them hung in chains, viz., one at Rappahanneck River, near the place whence they ran, and the other at York River, near the place where they committed the piracy. This account we thought proper to publish, in hopes it may be a means to deter others from such wicked courses, lest they should fall under the like unhappy circumstances.

"Vice Versa."

"Let me see some of your black kid gloves," said Mrs. Snaggs to a clerk in a store. "These are not the latest styles, are they?" when the gloves were produced. "Yes, madam," replied the clerk, "we have had them in stock only two days." "I didn't think they were, because the fashion paper says that black kids have tan stitches, and vice versa I see the tan stitches but not the vice versa." The clerk explained that vice versa was Latin for seven buttons, and Mrs. Snaggs bought the gloves.

"Dinna Be Fear't!"

The following incident is said to have occurred at a recent volunteer encampment. On a misty night a sentinel walked his allotted number of paces with martial steps, all unconscious of danger. But a stealthy tread strikes on his ear. He stops short in his march, brings his rifle to the charge, and in stern voice demands—"Who goes

Coming Home to Die.

At a period of life when budding womanhood requires all her strength to meet the demands nature makes upon it, many a young woman returns home from the severe mental strain of school with a broken-down constitution, and her functions disarranged, to go to an early grave. If she had been wisely counseled and given the benefit of Dr. Pierce's "Favorite Prescription" her bodily development might have kept pace with her mental growth, and health and beauty would not have given way to decline and death.

Col. Knapp, of Carson, Nev., going suddenly into his chicken yard, found a dead fox lying on the ground. It was still warm. He took it into the house, and his wife held the body in her lap while the children played with it. Some one opened a window, and the fox jumped from the startled woman's lap and made a leap for the window. He fell short, and was captured. It was a remarkable exhibition of "playing 'possum."

A Free Fight.

The great reputation of Briggs' Electric Oil is such that it has induced unprincipled persons to adopt other names as near like it as possible. The proprietors of Briggs Electric Oil have the name and style of the Electric Oil registered both in Canada and the United States, and no one can use it but themselves. Others hearing of the success of Briggs' Electric Oil have adopted other names similar, such as "Eclectric Oil," "Electron Oil," &c., and are striving to induce the public to buy them instead of the genuine Electric Oil.

In fact so determined were they that they brought a suit at Law, in the High Court of Canada, to deprive Briggs & Sons of their right to control the same; but the Courts and the Minister of Agriculture at Ottawa fully sustained their registered trade mark.

Briggs' Electric Oil cures Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Sprains and Bruises, complaints arising from Colds such as Sore Throat, Cough, Asthma, Bronchitis and difficult breathing.

Second—Any person who takes a paper from the post office, whether directed to his name or another, or whether he has subscribed or not, is responsible for the pay. It cures Dysentery and Diarrhoea, regulates the Stomach and Bowels, cures Wind Colic, softens the Gums, reduces Inflammation, and gives tone and energy to the whole system. "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" for children teething is pleasant to the taste and is the prescription of one of the oldest and best female physicians and nurses in the United States, and price 25c. a bottle. Be sure and ask for "MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP," and take no other kind.

Cholera Preventative.

In order to withstand cholera and such like epidemics a perfect purity of the blood, and the proper action of the stomach, are required. To insure that end, in the cheapest, most available and complete manner, use McGregor's Speedy cure for dyspepsia and impure blood. There is no purer, safer or more reliable remedy in existence for indigestion, dyspepsia, costiveness, etc. Ask your neighbor or any person who has used it. Sold at Grange's and Huffman's drug stores, Napanee, and at Jas. Aylsworth drug store Tamworth.

received a letter descriptive of his trip to the old country and the sights seen after his arrival. It came too late for this issue but will be published next week.

—The rain for once was conciliatory on Tuesday and kept itself behind the clouds all day. At Kingston it rained steadily all day from 10 a. m., till midnight, but notwithstanding the excessive dampness there was a large attendance at the circus.

—The question of providing a retreat for the indigent portion of the population of our county during the winter was mooted at the town council meeting Monday night and referred to a committee. Such an institution would materially lessen the charity expenses.

—Upwards of 140 head of cattle were shipped by G. T. R. from Napanee Wednesday by Mr. James Aiken, to Liverpool, Eng. It was a remarkably fine herd of animals and was valued at $10,000. The cattle were all purchased within a radius of two miles of Centreville.

—Messrs. McKim and Lowe having purchased the stock of C. W. Knight & Co., Tamworth, will continue the business in the old stand. They hope to see all old customers and lots of new ones too, and as they are well known to be excellent workmen, success should be their reward.

—One of the self-binders manufactured by John Herring was recently tried on the farm of Mr. Rooks, in Richmond, and gave the best of satisfaction. Messrs. Manly Jones, W. G. Gunn, Robert Shannon and J. W. Rooks were present and say that the machine did its work well. Twelve acres were cut and one team used.

—Mr. James Hosey has been improving his premises on the corner of Bridge and West-sts. The fence has been removed and the lawn nicely graded, while both houses have been painted inside and out and a new porch erected in front of the brick residence. We would like to see more of our citizens follow Mr. Hosey's lead in thus beautifying their residences.

—A rare opportunity to purchase an excellent farm of 100 acres is offered. The farm is situated on lot 16, first concession of Hallowell, the pleasantest part of Prince Edward county; 2 miles west of Bloomfield, 6 miles from Picton and 3 miles from Wellington. The proprietor wishes to sell on account of ill health. For further description of premises see advt.

—Monday evening a disturbance occurred on East-st., near the entrance of the Brisco House yards. The police appeared and ordered the crowd to disperse, when a young man named Kerr, of Belleville, in direct defiance of the officer's command, struck a bystander and knocked him over. He was arrested but allowed to go with a warning from the Mayor.

—Lockwood has the latest novel, "The Heiress of Glen Gower." New organ books, latest music, young ladies journal, cheap indelible pencils, the grenadier bank, a new thing and a great curiosity. For the boys interested in fiddling a sample line called the "Russian violin" will be soon to hand. As they say in the circus, "Wait for it." Lots of new things coming to hand daily at the Bazaar bookstore. Corner Brisco House block.

—Rev. Bidwell Lane, of New York City, occupied the pulpit of the Western Methodist Church on Sunday evening last. The church was crowded and the vast audience listened with marked attention to the able discourse delivered. The beautiful authem sung by the choir and the well chosen hymns formed an interesting part of the service. We were glad to notice that the Rev. Mr. Emsley had so far recovered from his illness as to be able to be present.

W. R. Aylsworth, reeve.

—The usual complement of fakirs, shell-and-pea men, three card monte and other tricksters arrived in town with the circus Tuesday, but were speedily made to "close up shop" by the Chief and Mayor. Chief McKinnon took a run down from Belleville Tuesday afternoon for the purpose of "spotting" these gentry.

—The "Grain" committee of the Board of Trade are making arrangements tending to increase competition in the barley trade, whereby the farmer will be greatly benefitted. With good crops of bright plump barley, and the efforts of this committee to sharpen trade, the prospects are good for a profitable season.

—At the council meeting Monday night Chief Allen was instructed to see that the dog tax by-law was strictly enforced. A batch of summonses to derelict parties will probably be issued next week. We have been authorized to state that this year costs will be added. If your dog has not been registered, see to it at once and save money and endless trouble.

—Chief Allen receiving private admonition Monday night to be on the look-out for a gang of burglars, pick-pockets and "bunko" men of all sorts who preceded and followed in the wake of Forepaugh's circus, extra policemen were placed on patrol and night-watchman Emberson was given a "pointer" to be specially alert. As a result of these extra precautionary measures no cases of theft or roguery have as yet been reported.

—The yacht Atlanta now owned in Brighton has been entered at all of the regattas of the Lake Yachting Association this season. At Belleville she took second money and at Kingston, Oswego, Toronto and Charlotte first money. With such yachts as the Norah Aileen, Ethel, Ariadne, Cygnet and Verve to compete with the above record is indeed a creditable one. The Atlanta was built by Cuthbert.

—Mr. Chas Stevens is doing a very large business in leached and unleached Canada hardwood ashes, which are shipped in large quantities to farmers in the United States, principally as a soil fertilizer. Last week he shipped seven carloads, one car being an extra quality of hardwood ashes for manufacturing purposes; the other six were despatched to one man in New Hampshire. Mr. Stevens has had some handsome circulars printed at THE EXPRESS office this week and intends booming the business.

—Bay of Quinte District camp-meeting will be held (D. V.) on Thursday, Aug. 26th, at 2 p. m., at Twelve O'clock Point, the head of the Bay of Quinte and entrance to the Murray Canal. Several distinguished Ministers will be in attendance. Cheap rates have been arranged for on the C. O. R. A cordial invitation is extended to Minister of adjacent circuits to attend. Kingstons camp-meeting will commence on the Glenvale camp-ground (about 8 miles from Kingston, on the K & P. R.) on Thursday August 26th.

—The regularly meeting of the W. C. T. U. was held at Mr. Symington's residence Tuesday afternoon. There was a large attendance of ladies despite the numerous outside attractions, and all greatly enjoyed the plain, practical address delivered by Rev. Mr. Lane, of New York. The rev. gentlemen spoke of the great benefits to be accrued by mankind from such an organization and referred to the good work done by similiar societies in the States. Committees were appointed to circulate the world's petition for prohibition, to be signed by women only. This is a mammoth undertaking, ladies of all climes and latitudes uniting in requesting prohibition all over the world.

Proposed Light in Mid-Ocean.

A hollow steel float, eighty feet square, anchored in mid-ocean, and bearing a sixty foot light tower, is the suggestion of an English inventor. He would have this known as a harbor of refuge in distress, or a place for transmisson of ship news by telegraph, and as a weather station. The saving of cost in cable telegraphing alone by the use of relay instruments on the lightship would, in his opinion, be sufficient to pay its current expenses. He undertakes to provide secure anchorage, stability and harmless deflection of waves.

THE CAPITAL OF CANADA.

The Spot Where Queen Victoria Dropped Her Finger.

A correspondent of the Detroit Free Press thus describes the Dominion Capital:—The years can almost be counted on the fingers of two hands that have elapsed since the day when a map of the British Possessions in North America was spread out for the inspection of Her Majesty Victoria, by the Grace of God Queen of Great Britain and Ireland and Empress of India. The august lady had been left the selection of a capital for the Dominion of Canada. Mindful of the mutual ambitions and jealousies of the great cities of this American realm—Montreal, Toronto, Kingston and Quebec—she dropped her finger on a point on the map that seemed to her the best compromise between the four, and which was the junction of three rivers.

"What is there?" she is said to have asked.

"The little hamlet of Bytown, your Majesty."

"Let that be the capital of my Canadian dominions."

So spoken so done. But there were many who mocked the regal selection. A capital removed from the center of population, in a howling wilderness and on a stream with impeded navigation, Bytown seemed to have no future. But time demonstrated the wisdom of Victoria's choice. Bytown, now Ottawa, has grown to be not only an important, but a very busy city. It is located on that great artery, the Canadian Pacific. It possesses an unusually beautiful location, and is fast becoming a noted pleasure resort. From the touch of the royal finger Ottawa sprang by magic from a straggling hamlet to a handsome city of more than 30,000 souls.

At first sight the capital of the consolidated Canadas has a decided tendency to make a person tired. The vicinage of the Canadian Pacific depot is especially wearisome. It has all the appearance of a backwoods lumber town. The buildings are roughly knocked together and daubed with different pigments. The city seems to end, after two blocks of this, in an abrupt high bluff. But it is after the ascent of this bluff that the city proper breaks upon the observer, a thing of exceeding beauty. New as it is, there is no prettier Canadian city. It may be said that the streets are altogether too narrow, and that there is too frequent an attempt to architecturally aggrandize stuffy little buildings.

The Parliament buildings stand on an imposing bluff on the south bank of the Ottawa River. The location is admirable and commanding. They front on Wellington street, one of the city's principal thoroughfares, and at the back look out upon the expanse of the Ottawa River from the Rideau to the Chaudiere Falls. The architecture of the building differs from that of any structure in the United States of like character. The design is Italian Gothic, and the material used in their construction is cream-color and red sandstone. They cost $3,000,000, and furnish a very elaborate and commodious headquarters for the government of 5,000,000 of people. The buildings, which include the departmental offices, occupy three sides of a square and face a principal street of the city. The Rideau Canal runs through a series of locks at one side of the grounds.

In the pretty suburb of New Edinburgh, across the Rideau River, is the home of the Governor-General, Rideau Hall, whence the Marquis of Lansdowne administers the government as the viceroy of Victoria. The citizens of Ottawa are very proud of this

CANADA AT THE COLONIAL.

Practical Results from the Exhibition.

Canada's contribution to the Colonial Exhibition is above all things practical. Hence it is interesting and important to note how far it is commanding success in this its chief aim and end. Last week we spoke of the trade results which may be expected to flow from the mineral display. The good effect of the game trophy is every day more and more apparent. Next week a party of eight start on a hunting tour for the North-West, and hardly a week passes but some sportsmen leave under Mr. Hubbard's directions. One might also point to the textile fabrics, the organs and pianos, and the miscellaneous manufactures, and enlarge upon the possibilities of results in each direction. But most patent of all is the outcome of the agricultural display. Canada's supreme want is population and capital. To attract both the one and the other, she properly realises that one of the best ways is through her agricultural resources. And it is from recognition of this fact in one united effort that Canada is deriving so great a benefit. Thus Captain Clark, now in charge of the Agricultural Court, there can be no better authority on this point, and he emphatically says:—"The fact that we exhibit our agricultural products as one Dominion rather than as isolated Provinces is a great point. We don't spread the whole over so many courts as our friends the Australians have done. All question of jealousy between Province and Province, district and district, is entirely done away with, and we present a solid front. No matter regarding what Province inquirers want information, I can point my explanations with the products of every part, from eastern Prince Edward Island to the distant Vancouver."

The visitors to the Agricultural Court fall, according to Captain Clark, into one of the following classes:—Those having relatives and friends in Canada, those about to emigrate, the investing class, and the commercial class. To the first class, those having friends in Canada, many visitors belong, and they all have reports of these in the new land. As a whole, these reports are so far satisfactory, as showing a strong liking for the natural conditions of Canada, and a faith in their own future independence. That there should be no unfavorable reports would be as unnatural as to imagine that every settler who leaves the British shores is suited to the new life. This, however, Captain Clark finds from experience since he has been in England; that to follow up unfavorable reports with care, tracing the career of the settler at home, is generally to learn that he was and is at best indifferent to good honest work, and altogether unlikely to succeed in any country and under any circumstances. As to the second class of visitors, the benefits of the display are directly apparent in the many inquiries for literature and, what is still more sought after, personal information. London does not, of course, in itself supply an emigrating class of the most promising kind, and were it not a gathering place for all people of all grades, the result of the Exhibition in this respect might not be as desirable as it promises to be. And this cosmopolitan feature of the great metropolis will be more than ever strikingly represented next month when the special railway arrangements throughout the kingdom bring to the Exhibition the people of the agricultural districts of the Provinces. The third and fourth classes of visitors, British investors and men of commerce, take [illegible] but

VARIOUS TOPICS.

Bartley Campbell makes slow improvement at Bloomingdale Asylum, if indeed he can be said to have improved at all. Two of his hallucinations are that he is a superian being, and that the Asylum is an hotel of which he is the proprietor. In odd moments he writes verse, which is usually unintelligible.

The Audubon Society is growing, and new branches are rapidly being formed. The members pledge themselves not to kill or capture any wild bird not used for food, not to disturb or destroy the nest or eggs of any wild bird, and not to make use of the feathers of any wild bird as ornaments of dress or furniture.

Temperance women in the prohibition village of Marshalltown, Ia., watched the drug store sales of liquors for a month, and ascertained that the six druggists sold 112½ gallons of whiskey, 2,197 bottles of beer, 81 gallons of alcohol, 6 gallons of brandy, 8 gallons of gin, 1 barrel of ale, and 5 gallons of wine. It wasn't a very sickly month either.

White persons have blacked up to imitate negroes from time immemorial. For a negro to "whiten up" to personate a white person is something new. This occurred recently in Montana, where a white child was required in a drama. A local little darky was the only child obtainable, and much grease paint was used in getting him to just the proper complexion.

The Comtesse de Paris, according to the London Truth, inherited all the sporting tastes of her family. In France, she was partial to hunting and shooting, breaking skittish colts, driving four-in-hand, or tiring out three or four horses at a chase. She dressed in a neat, masculine style, wore stand up collars, soft felt hat without feathers, and preferred waterproofs to luxurious mantles when driving her team of ponies in bad weather.

Deputy Marshall Trammell journeyed through Union county, Georgia, recently and stayed all night at the house of a reputable citizen near Blairville. The next morning when he went to feed his horse he found it without mane or tail, and bleeding from two ugly wounds in the side. The saddle and bridle had been cut in pieces, and a note pinned to a piece of the saddle warned him to get out of the country. He had to walk to Blairville, and was shot at twice on the way. This was all the work of moonshiners.

Peter Roux of Mono Lake took his family to Bodie, Cal., to celebrate the Fourth. His six-year-old daughter wanted to go home and started on foot. She ought to have gone south, but went north among the mountains and canons. When the moon went down she crept under a sage bush and slept, but awoke at daylight and went on. In the mean time Bodie had offered $100 for her rescue, and a searching party with Indians started out. They found her next day trudging along, hungry, but undismayed. She had walked twenty-six miles. She said she wasn't afraid.

One of the shrewdest of English Judges is as remarkable for the quickness of his eyes and ears as for the keenness of his intellect. The other day a stranger in court, espying a friend, addressed him in a stage whisper with "Halle, old feller! I haven't seen you lately. Are you all right?" The remark was hardly heard beyond the nearest bystanders, and there was, consequently, considerable bewilderment among those engaged in the case before the court when the Judge, looking up from his notes, ob-

He'd Vote the Way His Master Did.

Old Tam Murray, who was well known for his Radical opinions, was interviewed at the last general election by the laird's wife, who was canvassing for the local Tory candidate, and great curiosity was experienced by Tam's comrades as to what reception the lady would meet with. "Weel, how gat ye on wi' my leddy?' was the first question asked at Tam, as he presented himself at the smithy on the evening of the interview. "Oh, brawly," said Tam, with a twinkle in his eye: "I'm thinkin' there'll be a pheasant up my way the morn." "Ay, man! what said she? Was she askin' ye to vote for Sir George?" "Ay, an' I pleased the body gran', for I tell't her I was to vote the way the maister veted. Ye see the maister'll vote for the man that he likes best, an' I'll vote for the man that I like best, an' that's votin' the same way as the maister does, isn't it?"

Ha!

When trade grew slack, and bills fell due, the tradesman's face grew long and blue; his dreams were troubled through the night with sheriffs' bailiffs all in sight. At last his wife unto him said, "Rise up at once, get out of bed, and get your paper, ink, and pen, and say these words unto all men: 'My goods I wish to sell to you, and to your wives and daughters too; my prices are so very low, that all will buy before they go.'" He did as his good wife advised, and in the paper advertised. Crowds came and bought of all he had, his bills were paid, his dreams were glad; and he will tell you to this day how well did printer's ink repay. He boasteth, with a knowing wink, how he was saved by printer's ink.

Marquis of Lansdowne administers the government as the viceroy of Victoria. The citizens of Ottawa are very proud of this shadowy semblance of royalty. They were prouder still of what some were pleased to denominate the preceding "reign" of her Royal Highness the Princess Louise and her consort, the Marquis of Lorne. Lansdowne does not have enough governing to do to trouble his rest at night. Sir John A. Macdonald relieves him of most of these burthens. He is a very blue-blooded figurehead and that is all, but he costs Canada the pleasing stipend of $50,000 per annum besides the maintenance of Rideau Hall.

Looking to the northward from old Barracks Hill, the rocky promontory on which the Parliament buildings stand, the eye crosses the broad Ottawa River, the little fringe of settlement on the opposite bank and then spans a long vista of green and almost virgin country that stretches away for many miles to the foot hills of the Height of Land. It is a beautiful landscape. This all lies in the Province of Quebec. It is an unbroken wilderness, except for the lumber camps of the Upper Gatineau and an occasional very small group of French squatters. Communication with these remote camps and petty settlements is very difficult, as may be illustrated by the fact that just the other day a horrible murder in one of the Gatineau lumber camps reached the Ottawa newspapers about two weeks old. It is related in Ottawa that the few people in this expanse of country only pay taxes about once in five years and then at the earnest solicitation of a militia company sent up from the capital.

Ottawa has no tributary farming country worth speaking of, although the railroads are developing that portion of Ontario north and west of the city very rapidly.

The city, now the seat of Britain's American domain, may yet see itself the capital of a mighty rival of our own greatest government on earth. The Canadian Pacific has opened up to her an empire of timber, coal, grazing and grain country. It has already knit the people of Canada into a harmonious whole. There are dreamers about the Parliament buildings who confidently expect to one day hear a Canadian Pacific conductor shout: "Ottawa! Change cars for New Orleans, New York, Upernavik, Hudson Bay, San Francisco, Sitka and Pekin!"

Present Need.

More gentleness, more sympathy, more consideration, more knowledge of character, more real respect for one another, are needed in all the relations of life. Something of the old chivalry needs to be revived. Let there be more deference of husband to wife, of brother to sister, of parent to child, and homes will become more blessed. Let there be more deference of employers to employed, of wealth to poverty, and many social problems will be settled. Let the strong defer to the weak, the healthy to the sick, the wise to the unlearned, the skilful to the unskilful, the righteous to the erring, and the roots of equity will be strengthened, and the rich fruits of human love and happiness will abound.

Edward Lacey of Lewiston, Me., stood on a street corner the other day and noticed a gray-haired stranger approaching. The man said: "My name is John Lacey. I'm a stranger here, but I've got a brother living here whom I haven't seen in thirty years. His name is Edward Lacey. Can you tell me where he lives?" Mr. Lacey said he'd show the stranger where Edward Lacey lived, and he led him to his own house and then made himself known to long lost brothers.

tricts of the Provinces. The third and fourth classes of visitors, British investors and men of commerce, take it—but slowly, and take long to digest them. They must not be hurried; to hurry them is often to arouse their fears of some "Yankee trick." But though progression is slow it is at least sure, and in this sense satisfactory. To speak of one class of agricultural exhibits—grains, seeds, and milling products—inquiries are constant for the addresses of shippers. The quality of these products is happily a foregone conclusion with most of these men of commerce. But with some there still remains that vague and rapidly vanishing prejudice against all things "Canadian"—a prejudice which should teach producers this moral:—"To send second-rate products to a central emporium such as England is to raise a wall of prejudice which it will take years of good imports to overcome: send nothing if you can't be sure it will bear close inspection and comparison." Canadian meal and flour are products in which extended inquiry seems prevalent, but most of all the Red Fyfe wheat of Manitoba and the North-West claims attention. Of this the only complaint is that enough is not to be had. And why? For the very simple reason that the North-West has not hitherto had the supply to meet these outside demands. "Local demands," says Captain Clark, "and the wants of Ontario millers are such that the amount available for export out of Canada has been next to nothing. This year, on account of the splendid crop that is ripening, the problem of quantity for export to Europe will be solved, and the amount will increase each season when once a genuine start has been made toward direct shipments. Dealers here are willing and anxious to have the wheat, but their business is such that they must be able to calculate upon a fairly steady supply season after season. The very irregular and isolated quantities of the first-rate grain which it has in the past been possible to send do not at all answer the purpose."

Social Importance of the Fireside.

The fireside is a seminary of infinite importance. It is important because it is universal, and because the education it bestows, being woven in with the woof of childhood, gives form and color to the whole texture of life. There are few who can receive the honours of a college, but all are graduates of the hearth. The learning of the university may fade from the recollection, its classic lore may moulder in the halls of memory; but the simple lessons of home, enamelled upon the heart of childhood, defy the rust of year, and outline the more mature but less vivid picture of after years. So deep, so lasting, indeed are the impressions of early life, that you often see a man in the imbecility of age holding fresh in his recollection the events of childhood, while all the wide space between that and the present hour is a blasted and forgotten

WORTHY

Of Confidence.

AYER'S Sarsaparilla is a medicine that, during nearly 40 years, in all parts of the world, has proved its efficacy as the best blood alterative known to medical science.

SARSAPARILLA (extracted from the root of the genuine Honduras Sarsaparilla) is its base, and its powers are enhanced by the extracts of Yellow Dock and Stillingia, the Iodides of Potassium and Iron, and other potent ingredients.

IS your blood vitiated by derangements of the digestive and assimilatory functions? is it tainted by Scrofula? or does it contain the poison of Mercury or Contagious Disease?

THE leading physicians of the United States, who know the composition of AYER'S SARSAPARILLA, say that nothing else so good for the purification of the blood is within the range of pharmacy.

ONLY by the use of this remedy is it possible for a person who has corrupted blood to attain sound health and prevent transmission of the destructive taint to posterity.

THOROUGHLY effective renovation of the system must include not only the removal of corruption from the blood, but its enrichment and the strengthening of the vital organs.

RELIABLE witnesses, all over the world, testify that this work is better accomplished by AYER'S SARSAPARILLA than by any other remedy.

BLOOD that is corrupted through disease is made pure, and blood weakened through diminution of the red corpuscles is made strong, by AYER'S SARSAPARILLA.

PURIFYING the blood and building up the system require time in serious cases, but benefit will be derived from the use of AYER'S SARSAPARILLA more speedily than from anything else.

MEDICINE for which like effects are falsely claimed, is abundant in the market, under many names, but the only preparation that has stood the test of time, and proved worthy of the world's confidence, is Frank Bunton and Jim Adams of Music, Carter county, Ky., were enemies. This was why Adams gave Mrs. Bunton a thrashing when her husband was away, and that was why Bunton loaded his gun with buckshot and went gunning for Adams. The latter, who was playing cards saw his enemy coming. He held a good hand, and, laying it face down, asked his friends to wait until he had settled Bunton. He drew his pistol and crawled under a freight car, and when Bunton, who had had not seen him, came along, fired and missed him. Bunton saw Adams peering from under the car and fired a load of buckshot into his upturned forehead, killing him instantly.

In declining the Bishopric of Edinburgh, Canon Lidden says that, for one reasen: "During a great part of the last year I was seriously out of health, so much so as to be obliged to give up my regular occupations nearly altogether; and, although by God's mercy, and as a consequence of the long rest which the doctors insisted on, I am feeling fairly well now, I have yet to discover how far or how long a time I can return to my old habits of work. Until this is clear, it would appear at least doubtful whether I ought to undertake new and very serious duties." The Canon's delicate constitution gives his friends much solicitude, and he will probably never be a well man.

Donaldson, the swimmer, recently swam the Mohawk at Schenectady tied hand and foot. A young athlete thought that he could do the same, and after a friend had well tied him he started to cross the river. Half way across he gave out and went down. His frightened friend in a boat tried to get him into the boat, but couldn't. Neither could he untie the ropes. Meanwhile the swimmer was taken with severe cramps. Finally the man in the boat tied a rope around the swimmer's neck, and has towed the half-drowned athlete to shore, where it took considerable rubbin and stimulant to reduce the cramps and the youth in good condition again.

AT LAST!

THE CRISIS IN QUEBEC.

The Tories Hold Office until Compelled to Resign.

Thursday was a day long to be remembered in Quebec. Mr. Mercier, who by the choice of the people was returned to power as Premier of the Province, has, since the election, been harrassed on every side. The Tories were bound to hold office until compelled to resign.

Yesterday afternoon the House met and appointed the Speaker. Mr. Marchand, proposed by Premier Mercier was elected by a majorty of ten. This was a surprise for the boodle gang and was received by the populace with great rejoicing. Intense excitement prevailed.

TOWN COUNCIL.

An adjourned meeting of the council was held on Friday evening last for the transaction of business. Present—Mayor Cook, in the chair; Deputy-Reeve Lapum and Couns. Stevenson, Saul, Lowry, Davis, Aylsworth, Carson, Bowen, Gibbard and Joy.

A communication was read from the London & Lancashire Life Ass. Co., of Montreal, in the matter of interest on debenture coupons. Referred to the Finance Committee.

A copy of the petition to be signed by the council and sent to the Minister of Justice, asking for the release, or the shortening of the sentence, of Philip Hearns, was read before the council. A declaration made by one Wm. Keating, who is also serving a term in the Kingston Penitentiary, was also read, showing that Hearns was not present at the house at the time the assault was made, and that he (Keating) saw nothing of Hearns, excepting a few days prior to the assault, until they appeared in court at the assizes.

Moved by Deputy-Reeve Lapum, seconded by Coun. Bowen, that the petition be signed by the council as a body. Carried.

The petition was then circulated and signed by all the councillors, excepting the Reeve, who was not present.

The Finance Committee presented the following report:—

"That we have examined the by-law regulating the remission of taxes on the Napanee Brush Works, and find that it calls for an employment of twenty operatives, and $5.000 to be paid in wages. We find that the conditions of the by-law are filled in the statement presented to this council, as that number of hands have been employed and $6.626.06 have been paid as wages. We recommend that the taxes of 1886 be remitted."

"That in the matter of the assessment on the Harshaw block, destroyed by fire, we find that the assessment roll for 1886 has been revised as per the minutes kept by the court of revision clerk."

The report was adopted.

Coun. Carson stated that Mr. Symington had been assessed for the opera house for the year 1886.

On motion the matter was referred to the Finance Committee to report.

Coun. Joy, of the Street Committee, stated that $3.10 had been expended for snow shovelling since last session.

Moved by Coun. Carson, seconded by Coun. Gibbard, that the matter of opening up the street in East ward, from Vine's, northward, be referred to the Street Committee with power to act. Carried.

The Market Committee presented a report, the principal item being that they intend to put a stop to forestalling, and also the selling of butcher's meat without a license.

After a few minor amendments the report was adopted.

The Mayor asked the clerk to read, at the next session of the council, the by-law governing the granting of billiard licenses, as he had heard several complaints of minors frequenting billiard rooms.

Moved by Coun. Gibbard, seconded by Coun. Aylsworth, that in the matter of the real estate occupied by the Custom house, that half a year's taxes be remitted therefrom. Carried.

A GROWING INDUSTRY.

Push and Energy Building up a Good Trade.

It is not generally known that our townsman, Mr. Chas. Stevens, is doing quite a trade in Ashes—leached and unleached. Daily his teams are seen passing along the streets of our town, with loads of ashes, gathered from the various farm houses in the country. And the amount gathered in this way in this section, we understand, does not begin to represent the extent of his business. He has storehouses erected at different points on the railways, in which is stored ashes gathered in the several sections. From this place, or from his various storehouses, he is shipping almost daily. His business lies chiefly with the New England States, although he ships to other sections. Last week a car-load was shipped to Florida.

It is a puzzle to some where the ashes all come from. This is easily understood when it is known that they are gathered from the various farmers and villagers,—"in a personal canvass" as the politican would put it,—none being gathered from factories where tanbark, or other refuse, is used for firing. This our townsman claims is one of the great secrets in the production of a good article.

Mr. Stevens has given much attention to his business, and he believes he has it now down fine. His ashes he claims are cared for in the best possible manner, and being carefully selected, are number one. The growth of his business he attributes largely to advertising, as all do who succeed to any great extent. As an instance of how he values this medium of reaching the public ear, we may state that a few days ago he made a contract with one man for $225.

The push and energy displayed by our townsman are commendable, and we hope great success may crown his efforts.

INTERESTING LECTURES.

Three nights of this week Mr. Lou. J. Beauchamp, of Ohio, delivered three very interesting lectures in town, the audience on each occasion being good.

On Monday the subject was "Sunshine or 100 laughs in 100 minutes." This subject was the basis of a lecture on how to make homes attractive for the young. The speaker mingles the comic with the pathetic strains, and thereby wins the attention of his listeners. He spoke a little over two hours, his audience listening with wrapt attention.

On Tuesday evening his subject was "Temperance." He portrayed his course, by graphic descriptions of the benefits of prohibition and how it is to be attained. It was also listened to with great attention, the lecture throughout being well thought out and entertaining. On Wednesday evening he again spoke in the town hall and highly delighted his audience. At the close it was decided to form a Good Templars' Lodge, Seventy of the townspeople decided to join, each taking the pledge.

Mr. Beauchamp is a man that is master of Gosport, is in poor health. He has been confined to the house for some weeks.

—Mr. Williams, father of our esteemed townsman, W. S. Williams, leaves to-day for Southern California. He will spend the winter with his brother.

—The many friends of Rev. Hiram Williams, of Belleville, will be sorry to hear that he is lying very low with diabetes. His recovery is considered doubtful.

—Mr Morgan, traveller for Messrs Buntin, Reid & Co., of Toronto, was in town Tuesday. He speaks hopefully of the Liberal prospects in in Yorks and Torontos.

—Mr. Clayton Taylor, druggist, of Lynn, was in town a couple of days this week, the guest of Mr. K. J. Strong. His many friends were pleased to see him looking so well.

—Mr. Geo A. Parrott, of Belleville, formerly 1st Deputy Reeve, of Ernesttown, is visiting in town, the guest of Mr. John Parrott. He is accompanied by his wife.

SCHOOL STATISTICS

To those interested in school matters the following extracts from the annual report of the public schools of Napanee for 1886 will be looked over with pleasure, and the good and bad points ferretted out. The first section gives the number who attended the schools for 1886 and alongside, for comparison, the attendance for 1883. It will be observed that in the total number on the register there was six more in 1883 than last year. A greater number of boys attended in 1883, while of girls there was a predominence in 1886. The next lot of figures shows the number in attendance for different terms during the year, a pleasing feature being that there was a larger percentage present for the longer terms than the shorter Then follows the number of pupils attending each month for five years, and the average attendance for each year. These figures throughout are fairly even, but the better average for the greater portion of the past year calls for special note; the average the year round being much ahead of formers years

Sure Cure For Rheumatism.

If the system is properly cleansed by some medicine that acts upon the bowels, kidneys and skin, such as Burdock Blood Bitters, and the sufferer will use Hagyard's Yellow Oil according to directions, there are few cases of rheumatism, however bad but will yield promptly to the treatment.

More Trouble May be Expected.

If you do not heed the warnings of nature and at once pay attention to the maintainance of your health. How often we see a person put off from day to day the purchase of a medicine which if procured at the outstart of a disease would have remedied it almost immediately. Now if Johnson's Tonic Liver Pills had been taken when the first uneasiness made its appearance the illness would have been "nipped in the bud". Johnson's Tonic Bitters and Liver Pills are decidedly the best medicine on the market for general tonic and invigorating properties. Pills 25c. per bottle. Bitters 50c. and $1 per bottle. Sold by Perry & Co Druggists, sole agents.

Coun. Aylsworth, that in the matter of the real estate occupied by the Custom house, that half a year's taxes be remitted therefrom. Carried.

Moved by Coun. Davis, seconded by Coun. Gibbard, that the Town Property Committee be authorized to have the vault repaired for the purpose of keeping public papers and that public property be deposited therein. Carried.

Accounts from Jas. Allen, for amounts paid, amounting to $3.10; also from D. W. Fralick, for polling booth, etc., amounting to $5, were passed, when the council adjourned.

Addresses of Condolence.

The following addresses of condolence with two brothers, who have lately been called upon to suffer domestic affliction, were passed by Napanee Lodge, A. O. U. W.:—

To Bro. J. E. Richardson:—

The members of this Lodge are grieved to know that the home of Bro. James E. Richardson has been clouded by sorrow, by the death of his beloved wife. Recognizing the great loss to him and his children, who have thus been deprived of the loving care of their mother, the members desire hereby to express their heartfelt sympathy with Bro. Richardson and family in their bereavement, and also their hope that he and they will find consolation in the recollection that all our affairs are directed by a kind and loving Father, who is too wise to err and who doeth all things well.

Signed on behalf of the Lodge.

Napanee Lodge, No. 191, A. O. U. W.

To J. Lester Boyes:—

As the peculiar ties which bind us together in the fraternity of Workmen call upon us to sympathize with, as well as relieve the necessities of those who mourn, your brethren of Napanee Lodge, No 191, A. O. U. W., desire to express the sorrow which one and all feel at the severe affliction which has recently befallen your home. The Great Master Workman, in his inscrutable wisdom, has seen fit to remove your companion and helpmeet, but the hand that has bereaved can soften and asswage the keenest sorrow and line the darkest cloud with the radiance of an imperishable hope of a blissful hereafter. To Him we commend you, and to His care your motherless little one, assuring you that both will ever have the sympathy and good-will of your brother workmen. We remain yours, in the bonds of fraternal affection.

Matrimonial.

[Crowded out of last issue.]

On Wednesday, 13th inst., at 8 p.m., at the residence of Thomas Miller Esq., Tamworth, Miss Maud, his eldest daughter, a young lady of rare excellence, was united in marriage to Mr. Marshall C. Wagar, youngest son of John V. Wagar, of Centreville, in the presence of a large number of friends. Rev. Mr. Faul, of Centreville, officiated. The bride was supported by Miss Ida Caton, of Napanee, and the groom by Mr. Reuben Miller, brother of the bride. After the ceremony and congratulations were over the guests sat down to a sumptuous supper, a spread that could not be surpassed. The bride, who was admired by all present, was the recipient of a large number of valuable presents, among which was noticed a large bible. After a most enjoyable time the happy couple left for Ottawa, bearing with them the ardent wishes of a large number of friends for their future happiness and prosperity.

Threatened Danger.

In the fall of '84, Randall Miller of Maitland, N. S., was prostrated to his bed with an attack of incipent consumption. Cough remedies all failed. He rapidly debilitated, and friends despaired of his recovery. He tried Burdock Blood Bitters, with immediate relief, followed by a speedy cure.

decided to form a Good Templars' Lodge, Seventy of the townspeople decided to join, each taking the pledge.

Mr. Beauchamp is a man that is master of the subject, and his lectures are both entertaining and instructive. He has a marked accent, which makes it pleasant to listen to him. At the close of each lecture a hearty vote of thanks was carried on behalf of the speaker. He will return and speak again next Wednesday evening, when the officers of the lodge will be selected.

ROBBERY.

Neighbor Jamieson has again been unfortunate, but this time not in the runway line. On Monday night an entrance was effected into Mr. Jamieson's bakery by two parties and two bags of flour carried off. The entrance was made through a window over the oven. The flour was taken from among a few bags, and placed outside the door, without closing either window or door. Suspicion at once fell upon "Tom" Davy and Gage Nelson, the former having been seen hanging around there Saturday. The matter was placed in the hands of the police, and the flour was discovered in a small house on the Switzerville road, occupied by Gage Nelson and "Miss" Davy. The parties were arrested and placed in the cooler.

It was about the most clumsily managed piece of work seen for some time, but nothmore than we could expect from such "professional amateurs."

On the same night they entered Mr. J. M. Parrott's and Rev. Mr. Harding's barn, taking from the former two bags of grain and from the latter a sett of harness.

The culprits were brought before Justices James and Cook and on hearing the evidence were sent up for trial.

In the interest of the community it is well that these young men were caught, as it is believed they have been committing other depredations, and to what extent they would have been carried it is hard to say had they not been checked.

Addington Agricultural Society.

The annual meeting of this society was held at the village of Yarker on the 19th inst. On account of the drifted state of the roads the attendance was not as large as usual. Joseph Connoly, Esq, presided.

The secretary read a report of the society for the last year.

The auditors reported that they had carefully examined the Treasurer's books and the financial accounts of the society for 1886, and found them correct; that after paying all the premiums awarded, and all other claims, the society had a cash balance in hand of $64.46. It was signed by R. B. Hope and D. Connoly, auditors.

The report of the auditors, and that of the secretary were received and adopted.

The following were elected officers for the present year:

President—W. J. Delmage.
Vice President—J. W. Bertram and C.H. Finkle.
Secy.-Treas.—J. B. Aylsworth.
Directors—Sidney W. Wood, J. Forsyth, Thos. Scott, W. D. Mace, R. Nugent, M. Storms, Wm. Coburn, M. C. Shorey and Alonzo Walker.

A TALE OF SOCIAL LIFE IN CANADA.

BY W. E. BESSEY, M. D.

Discouraged and heart-broken with trouble and grief she returned home, and that night began to gather together a few articles of clothing, that she thought would be required; and hurriedly packing a valise, she retired after having given a few hasty instructions to her servants, and telling them she was about going on a journey for a few days. She retired early to get, if possible, some rest before starting on the early morning train; for she had resolved to seek her brother's interference on behalf of her worthless husband, if possible to secure his release. Such is woman's love. She could endure the misery of a drunken husband, but she could not bear the mortification and humiliation of the thought, that her husband, the father of her child, should be branded as a common felon; and the only hope she saw to save him was to enlist her brother Percy's co-operation. She did not intend to be long away if her efforts were successful, but if not she would much rather never see Montreal again.

With such feelings as these she arose early, after a sleepless night, and taking a light breakfast and wrapping baby carefully in travelling attire, she started for the station, accompanied by a maidservant, who carried her valise, all the while wondering what freak this was her mistress, always so sensible and nice, had taken. Always thoughtful for her mistress' and baby's welfare, she had fixed up a nice lunch, which she stowed away in a basket with a nice bottle of fresh milk, and seeing her mistress on the 7.30 train she wended her weary steps back to the house, wondering in her heart what new trouble this could be, or whether, in desperation, she had finally concluded to escape from her misery by deserting her home, and her miserable husband. Of course she was not yet aware that he had been arrested.

It was a cold, stormy night when Ruth reached Toronto; and being weary, she sought shelter in a quiet looking hotel near the station, where she was directed by the kind-hearted watchman, whose stentorian voice has waked the echoes in the vaulted roof of the Union Station for so many years.

"By George," he mused to himself, that's the most beautiful face I ever saw, be she flesh, or spirit, or both, it's all the same; she's a beauty and no mistake. It's too bad to see her in such trouble, poor lady; she looks as if she was after loosing every friend she ever had in the world. Perhaps she's lost her money; I guess that's it. Well, an' faith, if that's so, I'll be true to my country's good name, for I'm not an Irish gintleman if I don't go over to old Stubbs who keeps the 'St. James' and volunteer to pay for the night's lodging for herself and her baby; she hadn't much luggage, naythor; only a valise. Sure that thing don't look just right; there's something wrong. Maybe she's been turned out of house and home by some drunken blackguard or another."

And so off started No. X to make things smooth for the distressed lady.

"Faix, Mr. Stubbs, and I sent you a very dacent lady in distress over from the station. [illegible]

"Gone home," she sighed, with a groan.

"Yes, and he lives more than three miles from here," said the man, 'way out on Davenport Road."

"Davenport Road?" she repeated, "and where is that, may I ask?"

"Oh, I perceive you're a stranger here. Well, ma'am, it's a long way out, and it's snowing too hard now; it's too stormy for you to find it to-night. You take Yonge Street cars and then you get off and follow the road into the country. There are many fine houses along that road, and I can't direct you, but if you make inquiries you'll find it. He'll not be here till Monday now, to-morrow, Saturday, is Christmas, you know, and I'm shutting up to go home now till Monday. We won't be open till then."

"Oh, I must see him at once, to-night. I must see him," she said, as the snow blew in her face, almost blinding her. "God help me," she said, as her heart sank at the prospect of delay; if her errand was to be of any use it must be done quickly; it would not brook delay.

Wild grew the tempest, as it howled among the tall warehouses, and it was growing dark early. She pushed on, but lost her way and went several blocks too far; finally, through the kindness of a city watchman, who accompanied her to within sight of the hotel, she got back and sank exhausted on the lounge in her bedroom.

"Did you find him?" enquired the kind-hearted landlady, as she entered.

"Find him, no; but I heard of him and he's a long way out of the city. Oh, I must see him to-night, I must see him to-night," she exclaimed.

The landlady, now thoroughly interested in her, tried to soothe and comfort her, and encouraged her by saying that after she had got some warm supper she might go out and she would care for baby.

With a few cups of good warm tea her heart seemed to gain strength and with it new resolve. She would undertake the journey, she didn't know the house, but she would take the street cars, and she could enquire. But here a new difficulty arose. He lived with some friend; he was not married, had no house of his own. What was the name of the people with whom he lived? She could only hope by enquiries to succeed.

Wrapped in a heavy winter shawl kindly lent her, off she started, and taking the first car at the corner, forgot to ask where it went to until, on Sherbourne Street, well up, she asked where Yonge Street was, and was told she must alight and walk across to it; So Carlton Street led her to Yonge, and there, bewildered by the crowd of faces, not one of which she recognized, she, after making enquiries for Davenport Road, started on foot, no car as usual being in sight. On, on she sped through the blinding snow. Finally she reached the little chapel; this was Davenport road. And then for the experiment of finding a man in a multitude without any direction.

There was no time to lose; the storm continued with unabated vigor; the snow was blinding if one faced it; it was dismal, but her's was a heroic spirit; for love's sweet sake, and because she pitied and forgive one heard in that bright region where there is no night and storms never come, and a swift winged messenger had been sent to guide her to the very spot.

The place was all ablaze with light. She hesitated; she shrank from her task. She was all out of breath. She was all agitated. She must calm herself before she should enter. She leaned against a clump of evergreen trees beside the walk, and brushing the snow from the seat by its foot, sank down upon it.

"Oh, God, that I knew where I should find him! What if he is not here!"

That moan saved her life for the sound of a human voice, disturbed the spaniel dog which, bounding out from the porch, began to bark furiously at something down the walk, of which he appeared to be afraid.

Fearing that there must be some unusual cause for the dog's action, as he rushed back and forth between the porch and the cluster of evergreen trees down the walk, Major Dawson and Percy Elliott, who was enjoying a quiet game of chess, while the family were preparing Christmas trees, decorating the rest of the house, and preparing other pleasing surprises for the morrow, rushed out, and following the dog down the walk, came to the shivering shrinking form of a female, wrapped loosely in a winter shawl, and crouching half hidden behind the trees, with the bench at the foot. As Percy, who was in advance, approached, the woman looked up, and with chattering teeth, and with tremulous voice said.

"Can you tell me where Per—Percy—Elliott—lives."

"Yes, I'm Percy Elliott, what do you want him for?"

"Oh, Perch, don't you know me, Percy?' she said, as she made an effort to rise, "I'm almost perished hunting you in the storm, and cold. Oh, Percy, I've come to ask you to help me to—" and she choked for utterance, as she hung upon his breast; and he, in dumb amazement, stood like one who had lost his senses.

At last he found utterance, and exclaimed.

"Who are you, what brings you here, and so cold and wet? Why, what can this mean? Tell me, what do you want me to help you to do? For God's sake explain."

"Don't you know me, Percy? I want you to to hold me up, I am so tired and weak. I have been looking for you all the day long and all the evening until now. Oh (shuddering), Percy, I am so cold. Hold me up; I feel like fainting."

"Come into the house out of this storm and wind. Come, let me help you." He tried to move her, but her head fell back and sank like one lifeless at his feet.

"She faints!"

Her cheeks are cold, and the last leaden sleep
Hangs heavy on her lips.

Major Dawson, who stood by all the while, offered his assistance to carry her into the house, where they laid her on a couch. She lay there, pale, cold, and unconscious, like one that death was just about to claim for his own. But good, kind-hearted Mrs. Dawson rallied her daughters to her assistance; and by dint of hard rubbing, ammonia to nostrils, hot bottles to the feet, etc., etc., in a short time she was restored to consciousness, and looked around in strange bewilderment. Seeing Percy near, she held out her jewelled hand, on which she wore her mother's ring, to him, saying Percy, "Don't you know me, now, I'm Ruth!" and burst into a flow of tears, which brought tears to the eyes of all present.

Percy now recognized her, and exclaimed:

"Why, yes, it is Ruth, my sister, what, in heaven's name, has brought her here?"

At Mrs. Dawson's suggestion a cup of hot tea was drank gradually: and she was carried and put in a warm bath, the cold, wet

And so off started No. X to make things smooth for the distressed lady.

"Faix, Mr. Stubbs, and I sent you a very dacent lady in distress over from the station. She arrived by No. 4 from the East. Now treat her well, and if she hasn't any money to pay with call on me. Now, d'ye mind. Don't distress her any more, poor thing, she's lost a friend or home, or maybe she's only a little gone in the head. Heaven knows, but whatever happens her I hope she'll not fall into the hands of the ghouls of the city and lose her character."

At the thought of the possibility he turned back to say to the landlord that if she seemed impecunious he had better let him know at once, and he would make it his business to acquaint the charitable ladies of the city of the case, so that she might be assisted if necessary.

All this was going on in the mind and heart of the old watchman, whose quick eye had taken a true measure of the lady in distress; and who, timidly strange, in a strange city, was all too innocent and two intent upon the errand she had come about, to be in any danger of running in harm's way. All honour, all the same, to the good Irish heart of the watchman; may he always be as true to his own kindly instincts, and as faithful in his duty to the stranger and wanderer, and some day he'll hear a Voice shouting "All-aboard for heaven," and, as the angel chariot pulls up at its destination, "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these ye have done it unto me."

The landlord's heart was touched. He spoke to his wife. She spoke kindly to Ruth, interested herself in her, had a nice cup of tea made for her and something nice got for her to eat; fresh milk also for baby, making an excuse of her interest in babies to relieve the poor, weary mother of her charge and attend to its wants, getting it to feed well and to drink heartily of warm milk.

Supper over she showed her to a cosy, warm room, and bade her try and rest, as she feared unless she got a good night's rest she would be sick; her cheeks looked so hollow and sunken, her eyes so suffused and red with tears and fretting.

All night long her sobs and sighings could be heard in the adjoining room, as she tossed and turned, and reflected upon the position of affairs with herself and her unfortunate husband.

Next morning, after paying her bill (for she was not yet penniless, although she had but little money with her), which was liberally discounted by the generous landlord, she set out to find her brother, leaving her sweet little babe in the care of her new found friend, the landlady.

She searched the City Directory in vain for his address; she had forgotten to ask for it, or indeed hardly dared to, lest her intention and destination should be suspected; she wished neither.

All she knew was, that he was engaged in a branch house of a large Montreal firm.

All day long she searched through the business portion of the city and visited every branch of a Montreal house that she was directed to without result. At last weary and disheartened she turned her face homeward to the hotel and baby, and was hurrying along rapidly, when in passing along Front Street a name caught her eye, "Percy Elliott, agent for Messrs. Lyman, Kerry and Evans, Montreal, Dealers in Drugs, Chemicals, Dye-stuffs, Druggists, Sundries, Surgical Instruments, &c."

An exclamation of delight escaped her, which attracted the attention of the man at the door. "Is Mr. Elliott in?" she said. "No," was the reply, "he's gone home more than an hour ago."

[illegible] tinued with unabated vigor; the snow was blinding if one faced it; it was dismal, but her's was a heroic spirit; for love's sweet sake, and because she pitied and forgive one who had grievously wronged her, she would persevere. If God's own Son could expose himself to the miseries and infelicities of this sad, sinful world to save sinners, why shouldn't she, although she were an angel from heaven in purity, do her endeavour to save the man she had sworn to love from the ignominy and disgrace he had recklessly brought upon himself and all who bore his name.

As she hurried along, despite the blinding snow, remembering the directions of the woman of the inn that the road was a winding one and no gentlemen's residences existed along the first half mile or so, she felt that either the weather was growing colder or she was losing strength.

Would baby be all right with the woman at the inn. What would Percy say when she found him. Would he, could he, refuse to help her. No, surely not. Percy had always loved her, and through all the happy days of childhood and youth, as they grew up together, had he not called her his dear little "golden hair" until, growing tired of it, she had insisted on being called by her proper name, "Ruth;" and then Percy did not know anything, or, at least, very little of her sad experience; it had been kept from him at her own urgent request.

Ah! she thought, here they are, at last, those wealthy residences. She entered the first open gate; she rang the bell. A colored servant answered the door.

"Does Percy Elliott live here?" she asked.

"No mam, dere's no sich name on dis street, as I knows on."

She turned away sorrowful. A bad beginning, she thought, but she remembered those sweet lines:

"Lead kindly light, amid the circling gloom,
Lead thou me on;
The night is dark, and I am far from home,
Lead thou me on;
Keep thou my feet, I do not ask to see
The distant scene, one step enough for me."

And then she prayed that kind heaven might guide her footsteps to the door of her brother's habitation. And God's ever watchful angels carried that message to the skies. On she sped to another, and still another, and another, with like result. Oh! it was pitiful, to see that lonely woman, out in that blinding storm, seeking for succor at the risk of her life for a wretch who had cursed her very existence.

Again she rings the door-bell of an isolated residence and beautiful grounds; and this time an old servant woman, answering the door, was at once interested in the weary-looking stranger and besought her to come in out of the storm. She would enter the porch only. Well, thought the old servant, I have heard that name often, "Percy Elliott," why, that gentleman was here only last night, and I think he lives in a large house up the road about half a mile; there is a white picket fence in front of the grounds, evergreen trees stretch their branches over the walk; it is a pleasant, cheerful looking house, with a large porch. You will know it by an immense drooping elm tree that stands nearly opposite; and it is called by some 'The Elm,' although the gentleman who owns the grounds calls it 'Pleasant Cottage,' or Chateau-gay."

Thanking the kind old servant, she hastily renewed her journey, this time inspired by renewed hope and energy. But she was growing chilly, and felt her strength would give way if she did not succeed soon. The storm continued with unabated severity. She reaches the elm tree, and the white picket fence. She entered the gate. Ah! how nice—just like Percy to choose such a place for a home. Her petition had been [illegible] in heaven's name, has brought her here?"

At Mrs. Dawson's suggestion a cup of hot tea was drank gradually: and she was carried and put in a warm bath, the cold, wet clothes replaced with dry warm things, furnished by one of the young ladies. Percy was as much amazed and dumb-founded as if one long dead had arisen, but was forbidden to trouble her just then with questions, and kept still.

In a little while, with the warm bottles of hot water, etc., etc., natural heat seemed to return, and exhausted nature sank into a deep sleep.

Still Percy watched by her side, and after sleeping about forty-five minutes, she became restless; and muttering, called for her child, which woke her. Percy asked her if she recognized him, and if she felt better.

"Oh, yes, Percy. I'll be all right again. The way was so long, and it was so cold and stormy. I was only exhausted. I'll soon be all right now. I am not sick. But, my child," she exclaimed so earnestly as to startle Percy," my poor baby, where is my baby," and recovering her thoughts again she said, "Oh, my baby, Percy." I must go back to the hotel to my baby. Let me get up. Do, Percy, please. I must go back to baby."

"What hotel is baby at?" he asked. "I will go and bring it. You cannot leave here to-night."

"At the St. James, near the station," she replied, "and my valise is with it."

He hastily drew on his great-coat and leaving his sister to the tender care of Mrs. Dawson and her daughters, accompanied by the Major, who volunteered to go with him, they sallied forth. It was a wild night. The wind howled fiercely from the north; the snow which kept falling fast was driven in all directions by the wind. They made their way down the road to Yonge street and succeeded in catching the last car. How Percy shuddered at the thought of his poor sister being exposed on such a night. He could not divine the cause; it was a mystery to him yet.

They arrived at the hotel and enquiring for a baby left by a lady who had been seeking him, Percy Elliott, the anxious hotel people were much relieved to hear that she had found him out after all. They had tried in vain to dissuade her from attempting it on such a night, but she was desperate, and then they trembled lest she might have lost her way, and perished from cold and exposure.

The good landlady wrapped baby carefully up. Percy took it in his arms, Major Dawson carried the valise, and calling a sleigh, they were not long in reaching home with their precious burden. Mrs. Dawson took charge of baby. If an angel had arrived in that household it could not have received a warmer welcome than did that little one. The whole household vied with each other in attention to both child and mother.

Next day was Christmas. All Percy's engagements were cancelled, and the Dawson's, out of sympathy, spent a quiet day at home. Percy spent all day listening to his sister's story of grief and suffering. He was touched by her pleadings in favor of the man who had so cruelly wronged her. It was a woman's love—so tender, so forgiving. She had exposed her life to the wildest of storms, and a long and anxious journey, to ask his aid in behalf of her worthless husband. He must yield; he could not refuse her; but he was careful to let her know that it was for her sake and not his.

"For my dear baby's sake, then," she said; he nodded assent.

"And now," said he, "as soon as you are able we will start.

Meantime when Mrs. Blackstone was missed from home, all sorts of wild rumors were set afloat as to the cause of her flight and whither. No one knew, so secret had she kept her intention.

Arthur Blackstone had plenty of time to get sober in his criminal cell. Whiskey is not a part of prison rations; but he grew quite nervous and restless; this was heightened by the absence of any news from his wife. He expected she would have frantically flown to the prison to see him and to seek his release. He was more puzzled than any one; his conscience condemned him; he grew more wretched daily. The gaol doctor was applied to for something to quiet his nerves and give sleep. A sleeping draught was ordered—morphia, chloral, and bromide of potassium, in full doses. Blackstone saw, as he thought, lots of company that night in his cell. More than he wished to see. Big devils and little ones, baboons, monkeys, snakes, lizards and many-headed monsters appeared before him; and amid the gloom he thought he saw a skeleton pointing its finger at him, and with its fiery eye balls glowing at him, shout, "Yes, you are the man, you did it, you brought me here: and so you're here at last, are you? All right, now here's for it, let's see which can torment the other most." And then she would scream at the top of her voice until all pandemonium seemed to ring with the sound, "Yes, you did it, 'twas you."

His attendants failed to quiet him with the dose of medicine ordered, and growing desperate he seized the bottle and drank it off. The bottle contained several doses. He soon sank into a heavy stentorous sleep, which seemed to grow more profound until the attendants, becoming alarmed, the doctor was summoned.

Seeing that it was a case of narcotism, he used every means to arouse the patient from his stupor and to counteract the effect of the drug he had taken. It was no use, the breathing became slower and deeper, the pulse grew weak, flickered, life trembled in the balance.

"No constitution; prostrated from drink," exclaimed the doctors, for by this time more had been summoned. The pulse grew fainter, the breathing weaker and slower, until about four in the morning it ceased altogether. And he was gone—dead! the brilliant student; the fascinating lawyer; the dissipated husband; the forger against his wife—gone, dead! in a felon's cell!—no friend or companion near—Oh! the desolation of that hour.

Next morning the obituary notice in the paper read: "Died, on Christmas night, in a felon's cell, ARTHUR BLACKSTONE, the once brilliant lawyer. Young men, take warning. A promising youth died in a drunkard's and felon's cell. This is drink's doings. God bless the Scott Act or any other act that would keep men sober."

The day after Christmas, being Saturday, Percy Elliott arranged for apartments on the Pullman for himself and sister to Montreal. Reaching there on Sunday morning, they were shocked to find crape on the door of the Blackstone mansion; the blinds down, and the whole place wearing a funereal look. Oh, 'tis a ruse against something, they thought; but on entering and enquiring what was the matter, imagine their surprise on being told that Arthur Blackstone, whom they had come to secure the release of from prison, had already been released by death, the work of his own hand, accidentally swallowing an over dose of medicine.

This was a new grief for poor Ruth, but her tears refused to flow, her eyes were as dry as the hearth stone in front of the grate there.

"Poor fellow," she exclaimed, "if he had only known what I was doing for him I would have been satisfied," she said. "He will now think he was deserted by all,

YOUNG FOLKS.

Double Boys.

I do not mean twin boys, two little brothers so nearly alike that friends can hardly tell them apart, but two very different boys in one little body. You never heard of such a thing and do not see how that can be.

Let me see. If I were to take a handful of almond nuts and sit down to crack them, with you all standing about me, by-and-by you would see two little kernels lying in one nut-shell. When I was a little girl I used to call such nuts philopenas. Do you?

Well, just as those two little kernels lie snugly together in one nut, which looks exactly the same as other nuts on the outside, so do two little spirits lie inside of your little bodies, making you double boys.

Now if you look at some of the philopena nuts you will see that the two kernels are pressed and crowded out of shape; one will often be much larger than the other, but neither will be of the smooth, oval shape that belongs to almond nuts. This is because they are crowded two in one shell that was meant to be the house for but one nut. The shell is only just large enough for one, and if there are two, you see they must push and press and crowd each other.

So each little boy was meant for one dear little boy, and if two boys try to live in it, don't you see they crowd and press each other so that neither is of a right and perfect shape?

Shall I tell you of some of these double boys among you? Here is Harry. He has a very sunny, happy boy living in him with such a cross fretful double. Some days the happy boy looks out through his eyes, talks in his voice, and sings in his laugh; then whatever mamma asks him to do or says he may not do, there rings out the pleasantest "All right." I think that is the happy boy's name. Other days nothing is all right, but lessons, work, brothers, playmates, play, even dear mamma herself, are all wrong. That is because Master Fret is the biggest and strongest boy on those days and happy All Right is crowded close against the wall and the sunshine is all squeezed out of him.

Frank has two boys also. One is a loud boy that stamps and shouts, bangs and slams in the house as well as out of doors. His mate is a quiet little gentleman who remembers that too much noise disturbs the busy or sick or nervous people in the house.

One of Robbie's boys is deaf and doesn't hear well when he is called to lessons or bidden to do some work or when Papa says, No. The other of that double boy answers so quickly, pleasantly, and politely when he is spoken to that everybody likes to have him around,

In Ned's body lives the laziest fellow, who growls out, "I can't," "Too much trouble,' "I don't feel like it;" then he yawns and stretches and says, "I'm so tired." Along with him lives an active, cheerful fellow who plays with all his might and main, and sometimes when it is study time sets at lessons with a will and is such a nice scholar.

Now is it not a pity to have two such different boys in one little body? Would it not be ever so much nicer to have only one, and that the better one, growing into the fairest and most perfect shape? I am sure you think it would, so I am going to tell you that each of you can help the boy you like best to grow so fast as to crowd the bad ugly fellow into such close quarter, that he will shrink up and grow smaller and smaller till there is almost nothing left of him

Don't you know sometimes you'll find in

A FRAGMENT.

God is a Spirit
Everywhere,
In Earth, in Air,
On Land, on Sea,
Where fixed stars be,
Or planets shine;
Wide as His own eternity,
He reigns whom saints adore,
Eternal God for evermore,
The Pure, the Holy, the Divine.

The Spheres, that in their course
Obedient to His will Roll on for-evermore;
The Mighty Laws of force,
That magnify His skill;
Each in their Treasure-store,
Hath God within; He reigns
Where harmony obtains.

The children of His grace,
Who joy to do His will;
Who, everywhere can trace
His handy-work and Skill;
In Him, where'er they dwell,
Find fellowship complete,
In unison, their praises swell,
Their Heavenly pulses beat.

A Curious Phenomenon.

The following account of a recent strange occurrence was published a few days ago in the Scientific American. The correctness of the statements are vouched for by Mr. Warner Cowgill, American Consul at Maracaibo, Venezuela. He says:—

"During the night of the 24th of October last, which was rainy and tempestuous, a family of nine persons, sleeping in a hut a few leagues from Maracaibo, were awakened by a loud humming noise and a vivid, dazzling light, which brilliantly illuminated the interior of the house.

The occupants, completely terror stricken, and believing, as they relate, that the end of the world had come, threw themselves on their knees and commenced to pray, but their devotions were almost immediately interrupted by violent vomitings, and extensive swellings commenced to appear in the upper part of their bodies, this being particularly noticeable about the face and lips.

It is to be noted that the brilliant light was not accompanied by a sensation of heat, although there was a smoky appearance and a peculiar smell.

The next morning the swellings had subsided, leaving upon the face and body large black blotches. No special pain was felt until the ninth day, when the skin peeled off, and these blotches were transformed into virulent raw sores.

The hair of the head fell off upon the side which happened to be underneath when the phenomenon occurred, the same side of the body being, in all nine cases, the more seriously injured.

The remarkable part of the occurrence is that the house was uninjured, all doors and windows being closed at the time.

No trace of lightning could afterward be observed in any part of the building, and all the sufferers unite in saying that there was no detonation, but only the loud humming already mentioned.

Another curious attendant circumstance is that the trees around the house showed no signs of injury, until the ninth day, when they suddenly withered, almost simultaneously with the development of the sores upon the bodies of the occupants of the house.

This is perhaps a mere coincidence, but it is remarkable that the same susceptibility to electrical effects, with the same lapse of time, should be observed in both animal and vegetable organisms.

I have visited the sufferers, who are now in one of the hospitals of this city; and although their appearance is truly horrible, yet it is hoped that in no case will the injuries prove fatal."

"Poor fellow, she exclaimed, "if he had only known what I was doing for him I would have been satisfied," she said. "He will now think he was deserted by all, even by me. Oh, my God, my burden is greater than I can bear. Lord help me to cherish his good deeds, forgetting the evil, and so fulfil the law of kindness."

The funeral took place next day. All present seemed struck with dumbness, gloom being over all the scene.

Were we not in a reflective mood, and a believer in Providence, we might not have indulged in such thoughts as "What a happy deliverance," "What a special providence," "How strangely evils work their own cure, sometimes."

It was a gloomy Christmas at the Elliott mansion, and yet it had ended in a feeling of intense relief. No one conjectured where Ruth had fled to or what had been the object of her sudden journey; but it had terminated better than they had dared to hope, and she had brought back Percy with her. Blackstone was buried and, let us hope, all the sorrows of which he was the author, with him. Let us hope, also, that his disastrous career, and unhappy end, may have a lesson in it for those who think they can succeed in life, with ability or brilliant talents, without good moral habits.

As for Ruth, some sympathized, some blamed, but those who knew her best, admired her heroism and self sacrificing devotion to a worthless man. As for her mother she had prayed and waited for the deliverance which had come at last. And now Cowper's beautiful hymn on Providence haunted her like an inspiration, and she wondered why she had never before seen so much beauty in it, and so she kept singing over and over again:

"God moves in a mysterious way
His wonders to perform,
He plants His footsteps on the sea,
And rides upon the storm.

"Deep in unfathomable mines
Of never failing skill
He treasures up His bright designs
And works His sovereign will.

"Ye fearful saints fresh courage take;
The clouds you so much dread
Are big with mercy and will break
In blessings on your head.

"Judge not the Lord by feeble sense,
But trust Him for His grace;
Behind a frowning providence
He hides a smiling face.

"His purposes will ripen fast,
Unfolding every hour,
The bud may have a bitter taste
But sweet will be the flower."

Ruth, too, seemed to have changed greatly in a short time. She had grown more self-reliant and hopeful; and her strength and health seemed to be returning. When she did allow herself to reflect upon the sad career of her late unfortunate husband, she had but one regret, she bemoaned the action of her friends that had thrown him into a felon's cell for her protection—rather all had gone than that should have occurred.

"I should have thanked God," she would sometimes say, "had his good name been restored before he died. I did all I could, but I was too late and but for a merciful providence would have perished in the attempt. Had he but known I was working for his freedom I should be better satisfied." Thus mourned a faithful wife for a dissolute husband and father.

Brilliant Prospects.

Worthless father—"What's the matter, Tommy?"

Tommy—"I havn't had anything to eat for two days, and I'm so hungry."

Worthless Father—"Never mind, Tommy; if I get time I'll whittle you out a bow and arrer for a New Year's gift."

that he will shrink up and grow smaller and smaller till there is almost nothing left of him

Don't you know sometimes you'll find in an almond shell a good, fair, whole nut and one tiny, little shrivelled up speck that hasn't had any chance to grow into a philopena? Now the nut-shell hasn't any power to control what is inside of it. God makes to grow in it what he likes, one or two kernels; but God has made you different and leaves it to you to help the inside boy to grow. By thinking and taking a little care you can hush that loud boy's voice and step so they will not annoy others and make you seem rude; you can cure that boy's deafness so he will hear every time he's spoken to. The lazy boy will wake up and stir himself if he is only managed right; and the merry, happy boy can just swallow Master Fret if he is only given half a chance.

Is it hard? Well, yes, of course! But hard things are what make men of boys, and you all want to be men, you know, just as soon as ever you can.

Mark Twain and the Conductor.

A good story that has not yet been printed is told of Mark Twain by a friend. It appears that last winter, having to fill a lecturing engagement in a western city, the humorist boarded a train that is noted for its slowness and is always avoided by regular travelers. But the lecturing committee had written to the humorist, agreeing to meet him at the depot upon the arrival of this train, and so he had no alternative. Two hours traveling, however, served to put Mark out of patience. Stopping the conductor as he passed through the car, Mark asked as civilly as he could: "Why don't you people run this train faster?" The conductor, ignorant of who his questioner was, rejoined: "It runs fast enough to suit us. If you don't like the rate of speed why don't you get out and walk?" "Well, I would," returned Mark, settling back in his seat, "but that some friends won't come to meet me until this train arrives, and I don't want to be waiting around the depot for two or three hours."

A Remarkably Sharp Witness.

Sam Johnsing, having attended a night school for a few weeks, believes that he is the smartest nigger in Austin. He was a witness in a burglary case, and created a sensation by his intelligence.

"Do you think you would recognize the burglar if you were to see him again?"

"Why, boss, of course I would."

"You are sure you would identify the thief if you were to see him again?"

"I tell you so ag'in. I'se not one of dese fool niggers what doesn't know nuffin.' I could 'dentify dat man eben if I nebber seed him ag'in. I don't hab ter see him ag'in to 'dentify him."

Of Course.

"If you had a note to pay to-day," he said as he sat in an insurance office looking straight at the agent, "and you had all the money but $5, would you ask a friend to lend it to you, or would you let your note go to protest and ruin your credit?"

"Let the note go to protest, of course!" was the prompt reply.

Then the clock ticked and ticked, and the noise of a hair falling to the floor sounded like a crow-bar, and the man with the note said he guessed it was going to snow, and the entrance of a couple of visitors mercifully permitted him to escape.

though their appearance is truly horrible, yet it is hoped that in no case will the injuries prove fatal."

No Light in the Window.

As the train sped along in the night, with drowsy passengers outstretched upon the seats, the conductor was observed frequently peering out of the frosty window into the darkness. The night was black, and nothing could be seen but a sheet of snow over the shadowy landscape, and yet the conductor shaded his eyes with his two hands and held his face—a weary looking face it was, too—close to the window-pane.

"Looking to see if your girl is awake yet?" inquired an inquisitive passenger, with a coarse laugh.

The conductor looked around and shuddered, as with a husky voice he replied simply, "yes."

And then the inquisitive passenger became garrulous and familiar. He sat down beside the conductor and poked him in the ribs as he lightly said: "Ah, I see. Going to get married and quit the road. Going to marry a farmer's daughter. Worth much?"

"She's worth a million to me."

Further remarks in a similar vain did the passenger make, but the conductor deigned no more replies. Suddenly the whistle of the locomotive gave a long, low moan, the conductor stuck his eyes still closer to the window, seemed to fasten his gaze upon some object in the darkness, and then fell back in his seat with a cry of despair upon his lips.

The passengers gathered round to inquire the nature of the trouble, when the brake man assisted his chief to rise and led him into the baggage car. The conductor's face was as white as the snow-banks which fringed the iron roadway, and his eye was a look of tearless grief.

"Poor Sam!" said the brakeman, upon his return; "it's a bad night for him. Four weeks his little girl had been ill. Night after night he was at her bed, but then she got better and he came back to his train. He arranged with his wife that if all was well with the little one she'd display a lighted lamp right in the window of the sick-room. The boys all knew it, and every night we looked for the light almost as eagerly as Sam himself. He lives by the side of the track back a few miles—and to-night there was no light in the window for Sam."

A Colossal Liar.

I think lying is older than gambling. The primordial protoplasmal globule lied, I believe. In old Olympus the gods lied like pirates, and if you read mythology you'll find that Jupiter had to lie to Juno nearly every night. And she caught him out nearly every time. Juno was a rustler. I don't believe lying ever reached such absolute perfection as in a man who came on the overland with a friend of mine lately. He could not be beaten, on any proposition. They got talking about gold mines, and the Californian thought he knew a good deal about that subject. The stranger was a mine owner.

"You should see my Peruvian mines," said the traveler. "That's the place where they have gold. I've seen specimens—specimens that ran up into the hundreds of thousands."

"Well," said the Californian, "I have myself a specimen of pure virgin gold."

"My dear boy, I've a hundred specimens that beat virgin gold."

"Say!" said the Californian, "In your travels did you ever hear of a man named Baron Munchausen?"

"Oh yes. He owns the next claim to me."

RIFT AND SPRAY;

OR,

LOVE AND VENGEANCE AMONG THE SMUGGLERS.

THE MOST FASCINATING OCEAN ROMANCE SINCE THE DAYS OF COOPER AND MARYATT.

CHAPTER XX.—TO THE RESCUE.

We left Captain Morton, of the Nautilus yacht, in the honest and sympathizing society of Admiral Clifford. Between them had sprung up a friendly feeling, such as was more than likely to unite men of equal generosity of soul. A hidden community of feeling—of which they could hardly be said to be fully aware as yet—more firmly united them together; and as they listened to the guns from the Spray, which announced her entrance to port, each seemed to look at the other, as if he would say:

"These sounds are interesting in some way to both of us, because they will be interesting, certainly, to one."

But a great change was about to take place in the mode of proceeding of the two officers in their search for the daughter of Captain Morton—a change which no longer in any way necessitated that assistance which the admiral had suggested.

That change was brought about in this way: During the slight pause that ensued while they listened to the guns of the Spray in the offing, a miserably clad woman came up to the admiral and put into his hand a folded paper, which he at once without opening, returned to her, with a shilling on the top of it, as he said·

"My good woman, I dare say it is all here, and you are very badly off. But I am not able to give more, because I am forced to give so often."

"I do not want charity," she said.

"Then what is it?"

"Read that, sir."

The admiral opened the letter, and read the following words:

"If ever it should happen, while I am away on a cruise, that any inquiry is made about either of the children, it will be safer to make away with them, than allow any one to get them from you. I have, as you know, full confidence in you and although, of course, the girl is of very little consequence to me and my project, compared with the boy, still I will not have her go; and I would rather hear that she was dead, than that she had got away. Besides, she knows too much now and is clever far beyond her years, as you well know. Take her to the cave at once, on the least alarm, and do not let her stir till it is so completely over that there can be no danger. There is however, not much chance of any stir being made about her, since the American ship was never spoken of; and I believe that she was the only living soul saved from it. So now, Wagner, I beg of you to be very discreet indeed. I will take Gerald with me next cruise and that will be the last, as I hear the port admiral is on the lookout for the Rift. I sent this by Bowline, who will call at the cottage to see you about other matters."

"What is all this about?" said Admiral Clifford.

"You have read it?" said the woman.

"I have."

"Then read it to me, sir."

The admiral did so; and then the woman clapped her hands and said

"That is it; I know now. That's what makes madam such a fine lady, that she can't so much as say "sit down" to her arm of the admiral as in accents of deep emotion he said:

"My child! my child! my own dear little one! At once, at once I will go. I ask for no help, for no assistance; for I feel that there is danger to my darling's life. I shall now seek her alone, admiral. This cottage, I will go to it at once; she may be there. I know the cottages on the beach; I will seek her there now, on the moment."

"Stay," said the admiral. "The cottages you speak of are not those you will have to seek. A boat will be your best conveyance to those in the occupation of the fisherman. I have heard of this man Dolan."

"Yes, my dear friend. God bless you for all your help and sympathy! A boat! I will go in a boat at once."

"Avast heaving, admiral!" said the sailor. "Here's Captain Grey and some of his quarter deck big guns, sir."

"Captain Gray? Oh! Captain the Honorable Minto Grey!" said the admiral, with a slightly perceptible smile. "We shall hear something now of the cruise of the Spray."

The noble captain of the Spray had landed, and was with a look of intense ennui, slowly approaching where stood Admiral Clifford and Captain Morton. The lieutenant of the Spray was close to his captain. When sufficiently near to do so with effect, the Hon. Minto Grey put up to his eye—where he at once fixed it by muscular contraction—a glass, and took a good look at the admiral.

"'Pon life," he said, "it's the old commodore."

"Yes, sir—the port admiral," said the lieutenant.

"What a providence!—seems no end of bother. Well, admiral that's over. Sunk the Rift."

"Sunk her?"

"Oh, yes! Rather a low affair, ah. To London, now as fast as post horses can take me."

"Sunk the Rift have you, Captain Grey?"

"Oh, yes. It's in the log."

"Oh!"

"Yes, ah. Quite a trouble, but it's in the log. Where's the log, Mr. Green—eh? The log."

"Here sir."

"Oh! Well let the admiral have the log. Haul down my flag on board the Spray. I'm off. Good-day, admiral—by-by! Ah, what a fatigue! That's over"

The Honorable Minto Grey strolled slowly away, leaving the lieutenant with the ships log-book in his hands, which he had taken from a sailor who had followed with it from the boat.

"The puppy!" said Admiral Clifford.

The lieutenant coughed.

"Oh, I beg your pardon, sir!"

The lieutenant bowed.

"I shall be happy to see you to dinner, sir, and then you can tell me more than captain Grey seems inclined to do of the [illegible]."

The lieutenant coughed again.

"You look, sir, as if there were some mystery in this affair. What is it?"

"The log-book, admiral, states that the Rift is sunk, under fire from the guns of the extent of the cavernous recess was to that amount increased.

And against the covering of the sea-cave, where rode the Rift so securely, came the lashing tide, and a deep, misty gloom settled upon the face of the sea and the darkness was thick and palpable.

The smuggler and pirate felt that the authority was no longer of the character it had been among the lawless men he commanded and he had an appreciation of the necessity for conciliation.

It was, then, with such an idea that he called aloud to the crew of the Rift after the departure of Gerald from the vessel.

"Forward, all hands—forward! I have a something to say which may be for the good of all."

"You know my men," said Dolan, "that we have a prisoner on board the Rift."

"Aye, aye," was the cry. And a dark, scowling look came over the faces of some of them; for, contemporaneous with the thought of the possession of that prisoner, came the idea of the necessity of getting rid of him.

"You all know," added Dolan, "who that prisoner is."

"Aye, aye—the French captain!"

"Yes, the French captain. Now, my men, Captain Mocquet knows by this time a great deal about us."

"Death! death!" cried several.

"And Captain Mocquet is a rich man. There can be no doubt but that if we set a handsome value on his life he would pay it. Why should he not pay it?"

The crew were silent They did not fully comprehend the scope of Dolan's remarks.

"I mean," he added, "that if we let him go free we ought to be paid."

"Aye, aye," cried several.

"And as we are about to separate and give up this little confederation—as you are all about to leave me, each taking his share of the plunder and the profit of our cruises, why, such profit may as well be increased by a good round sum from the Frenchman.

"I propose, then, that he be ered his life for a hundred thousand francs."

"How much is that?" growled one.

"Five thousand pounds!"

Several of the crew whistled.

"Well, if you think it too much, we will say half that sum; but I am sure he is rich, and can pay whatever amount we want of him."

"And if he won't pay?" said Martin.

"Then I should say, for the general safety, hang him!"

"Belay there, mates!" said Martin, as there arose an angry growl from the crew. "The general safety won't be a bit better if he does pay the money; because then, you see, mates, he can go away at once."

"Oh, no!" said Dolan.

"Then, mayhap, captain, you will say what he is to pay the money for?"

"Aye, aye! Old Martin is right. What an out-and-out sea lawyer he is, to be sure!" said one.

"We can still keep him," said Dolan, "until we are dispersed; and anything he might say or do would be of no consequence to us."

"Mayhap, then," added Martin, "we can do that in any case; and then you see, mates, you wouldn't foul your hands and your souls with a useless murder?"

"You are a mutinous rascal!" cried Dolan. "My men, I call upon you to seize this fellow; he is a spy—he will betray you some day!"

No one stirred.

Old Martin looked as calm as possible, and then he said:

"Why, you see, mates, if I was what the captain says, and if I meant anything wrong to you all I should keep a smooth, civil tongue in my head; but you know, and he clapped her hands and said

"That is it; I know now. That's what makes madam such a fine lady, that she can't so much as say, "sit down," to her poor sister. I thought as much!"

"What do you mean?"

"Why, that my sister, Mrs. Wagner, is carrying on affairs for Captain Dolan, to be sure, of the Rift, and that this letter, which I put in my pocket when she was not looking, is from him, and means that the little girl is to be murdered some day if anybody comes to look after her. I only asked her for a few pounds to take me to Gibraltar, where my husband is—he's a soldier; but she turned me out of her cottage, and I saw this letter, with just the corner of it peeping out of a closed door, so I dragged it out and brought it with me. And I know that Captain Dolan is a smuggler, and not a bit a fisherman."

"But what child—what little girl do you talk of?" said Captain Morton, with emotion.

"Oh! She told me about that long ago; it was saved from an American ship. She sha'n't turn her back on me for nothing. You had better, sir, as you are a great admiral, go and rout out Dolan; for I tell you he's a smuggler, and the Rift goes out smuggling—not fishing. And then there's an end to your airs and graces, Madam Wagner! Hoity-toity! indeed—not so much as 'you are welcome for a day or two, sister.'"

"Woman," cried Captain Morton, "you have said too much and too little."

"What do you mean, sir? You are hurting my arm."

"I do not mean to hurt you; but if you will answer me what I shall ask of you, I will give you the money you want to join your husband at Gibraltar."

"It's three pounds, sir."

"There are five. Now tell me where this Mrs. Wagner is to be found."

"In one of the cottages, sir, on the beach. In Dolan's cottage you will be sure to find her or Mrs. Green."

"Mrs. Green!—who is she?"

"Oh! very old, indeed. She minds the cottage while Mrs. Wagner is away."

"Away where?"

"That she never would tell me. But I know that she and Dolan and all the smugglers have got somewhere to go to that they can hide in, and where nobody can find them. I'll teach her to show me the door! Who's she, I wonder? Let a beggar on horseback! Oh! indeed!—and her fine carriages too, bobbing about? Hoity-toity! a great madam we are!"

"But the child—the girl!" cried Captain Morton; "what of her?"

"Well, sir, I don't know anything more of her but that she is with Mrs. Wagner."

"At the cottage?"

"To be sure."

"You saw her?"

"Well, no; she was not there, but that's where she was a year ago."

"You saw her, then?"

Captain Morton's voice was almost choked with emotion.

"To be sure."

"And she was—that is, was she very beautiful, with fair hair, inclined to auburn, and long lashes? She—she had a very sweet smile—so light, so gentle; and her eyes—something sad about the eyes, I think."

"Well, I think yes; and I saw the corals."

"The what?—the corals?—a necklace. Bracelets, jagged, natural corals that the child wore when the ship was wrecked. The snaps were rough Indian gold."

"Yes, I saw them, and a fan made of feathers, which was found in a box that came ashore after the wreck, Mrs. Wagner said."

Captain Morton leaned heavily upon the

"You look, sir, as if there were some mystery in this affair. What is it?"

"The log-book, admiral, states that the Rift is sunk, under fire from the guns of the Spray."

"Well, sir, I suppose there can be no mistake about that?"

"I hope not, admiral; but if you will permit me to go on board the Spray again, and continue the cruise, I shall feel greatly indebted to you, sir."

The admiral bit his lip.

"Now, is not this too bad!" he said. "I ask for a vessel on a special mission and they give me one with such a commander as—as that—"

The admiral pointed to the retreating lounging figure of the Honorable Minto Grey who was making his way to the principal hotel as quickly as was consistent with the lazy habits he usually indulged in.

"Very well, sir," added the admiral. "Then go on board the Spray and take the command as from me. Do your duty, sir. It is not for me to do so serious a thing as question the logbook of Captain Grey; but go, you, sir, and do your duty."

The lieutenant bowed.

"I shall be glad to have a report from you, sir, whenever you please; and if you want any stores, you can have them, sir!"

"We want nothing, sir; and I have the honor to bid you good morning, sir!"

"Good morning! Captain Morton! Eh!—what?"

"Went off, admiral, in full sail," said the sailor servant. "Clapped on ever such a lot of extra canvass when he got to the corner, and went before the wind, sir."

"And that woman—where is she?"

"Nor'-nor'-west, sir. Tacked up Albion street, sir, and got somehow into port; for I didn't see no more of her."

"Well, well. No doubt we shall soon hear something more of Captain Morton. He seems a noble fellow."

"As true a seaman, admiral, as ever stepped between stem and stern. There, sir—there lies his little craft! the Nautilus, sir. Ain't she shapshape? Hilloa!"

There was evidently some movement on board the Nautilus. In another moment, as if some sea-bird had spread its wings, a streak of snow-white canvas fluttered aloft. Then a small boat might have been seen dancing over the water. Captain Morton was going on board his yacht.

At the same moment another boat was, at an angle from that one, making for the Spray, which had not dropped her anchor, but stood off and on in the roads.

Lieutenant Green was going to take his new command.

Bang! went a gun from the Nautilus; and the admiral accepted the salute as a "good-day to you, dear friend," from Captain Morton.

"Good fortune attend him!" he cried "He is a gallant fellow."

The stars and stripes, then, of the United States flag flew out from the Nautilus; and she went on her way, like a sea-bird, toward the cottages that had been indicated as those in which Dolan and Mrs. Wagner had their abode.

CHAPTER XXI.—The Pirates Divide Their Plunder.

There is a heavy roll of sea up the English channel and against the chalky ramparts of old England the waves beat tumultuously, rushing back in foam and with sounds resembling the boom of artillery in the distance.

And into the cavernous recesses of the old cliffs, with a hissing vehemence, went the salt ooze, dashing into every crevice and bringing away chalk and flintstones to add to the debris at the bottom of the sea, while

"Why, you see, mates, if I was what the captain says, and if I meant anything wrong to you all I should keep a smooth, civil tongue in my head; but you know, and he knows, that it is not true. All I have to say is that it's a sad and horrid thing to kill the Frenchman. You will say, some of you, he is only a Frenchman. I know that; but, poor man, that's his misfortune, not his fault."

"Good," said several of the crew.

"I propose, then," said Dolan, "that Captain Mocquet be offered life for fifty thousand francs—death, if he refuse! Who says ay to that?"

"Ay, ay!" cried several voices.

Then old Martin dipped his hands in the water and shook them over its surface.

"Look, you mates!" he said; "you know, some of you, what that means? It's a sailor's way of saying he washes his hands of that affair! Some of you have said ay to it; I say no?"

"Come on board, all of you," said Dolan. "It is one for all, now, and all for one. Let the boats drift."

One of the boats was made fast to a ring-bolt in the side of the cavern, and the rest were let float about, attached to it by the tow ropes, how they pleased.

"Bring him up," said Dolan. "Off with the main hatch!"

The order was obeyed; and then Dolan slowly crept away from the hatchway; for he knew not but that the first object that might meet his gaze would be the fair young face of that (as he believed) drowned girl, who had terrified him in the cabin; so that he would not have descended to it again for the whole sum he had just mentioned as Captain Mocquet's ransom.

"Ahoy!" cried Bowline down the hatchway. "Come up, you mounseer. Come up, will you? Ahoy!"

No one came.

"Very good," said Dolan; "go and fetch him."

"I are here!" said Captain Mocquet, looking pale and wan, as he appeared above the hatchway—"I are here. What for to go do you want of me?"

"Close the hatch," said Dolan.

The hatch was closed; and then Captain Mocquet uttered a kind of sigh of relief. His heart was in the cabin of the Rift, with his darling child.

"What want you at me?"

"Look you here, Captain Mocquet," said Dolan, "you are in our hands; you know now the secret of our cavern—at least, you will be able to guess it. You are dangerous to us; therefore—"

"Arretez. Monsieur Capitaine," said Mocquet, "I shall tell you. I, as one prisoner, was obliged here. I do not come (what you call him?) my own self, but unwillingly."

"That may be true enough, but it is the fortune of war."

"War? Non! Bah!"

"In a word, then, Captain Mocquet, we intend to hang you! Do you comprehend that?"

The French captain slightly bowed his head.

"I was to know," he said, "that to be one smuggler was to go by the custom-house—was to not pay what you call the duties—eh bien. That was little. I am for the trade free, on the shore of all nation, the goods of all nation, and the high bidders shall buy him. Bien! I care not for one smuggle. I place my hand on what you say one stomach—que dites-vous en Anglaise—no stomach? Stomach! ah, non—on my heart. I place my hand on my heart and I say to him, be tranquille—soyez tranquille—I say to him soyez tranquille, and smuggle! Bah!"

"But what's all that to us?" growled Bowline.

"I shall say to you what you call clear to the most mean and despicable capacity."

"Well, that's civil."

"Mais, as I say, I smuggle; but when I smuggle I do not cut de troat—coupez la—bah! bah! I will promise, parole d'honneur, I will not say of this place, or of anything; but I will go free, and I will have no more to deal with the Rfft."

"That won't do," said Dolan.

Captain Mocquet shrugged his shoulders and his hand shook as it rested on the hatchway. He knew he was—supposing a direct line could be drawn from him to her—about sixfeet from the heart of his Maria.

"Listen, n " added Dolan. "We in tend to divide our gains and to disperse. Pay us—give us an order on some one in France and when we get the money for it—an order for fifty thousand francs—and I say when we get the money for it you will be free."

"Ah, you disperse—you smuggle no more—and the Rift—the cutter—the Rift?"

"That we shall take to some port and sell."

The countenance of the French captain brightened up, but his hand trembled still more as he said hurriedly:

"Bien, you sell him. I buy—I buy of you all the Rift. I give you fifty thousand francs for the Rift and for my life. I take him—I sail away wid him. I say bon soir, messieurs—I say no more. I buy him and give the order on the bank at Havre. I have spoke, mes amis. It shall be—eh? Eh?"

"That's fair!" cried Martin again.

"No," said Dolan. "I won't part with the Rift."

Mocquet's countenance fell.

"She's mine," added Dolan.

"Oh, no—no! Dieu merci! No—no!"

"Why, what's the matter with you now?" growled Bowline. "The rope is not round your neck yet, mounseer!"

"You will not sell to me the cutter?"

"No; I will not sell the cutter to any one," said Dolan, "at present. I will take another thought about that; and if I do sell her, it will be for more than you say. You offer nothing.

"Bien! nothing?'

"Nothing. The fifty thousand francs are for your life. You offer nothing for the cutter."

"Ah, I see. I shall give—what shall I give? I shall give fifty thousand more for the cutter."

"That's a good offer," said Bowline.

Dolan was silent.

"Hark you, captain," said Martin. "that's fair, and my mates right and left of me think it so. They fancy it will be a good round sum to divide among us along with what you have got to give us as well.

"Be it so," said Dolan, briefly.

A flush of color came to the face of Mocquet, and clutching the hatchway, he said:

"Then he is mine—mine, and no one dare—no one shall go! Hush! Bah! I shall say too much. I will buy him, then, one hundred thousand francs for life and the Rift?"

"Yes."

"I shall write one order; and I shall promise that one seal is on my lip—one seal.'

"What does he mean?" said Bowline.

"He means that he will be secret," said Dolan.

"Oui—yes—secret. I will never—never say one word of the place, nor of the cruises of the Rift—never—never!"

"Lights closer here!" said Dolan.

Several flaming flambeaux were now brought close to the little group on the deck of the cutter, and Dolan, turning to Bowline, said:

"Go below; in my cabin you will find pens and ink and paper."

Some More Prehistoric Houses.

Dr. Schliemann, accompanied by his wife, has left Athens for a voyage up the Nile as far as the second cataract. He hopes to be able to begin excavations in Crete in the spring, on his return from Egypt.

Originally he had intended resuming his work at Mykene, in the hope of discovering the palace of the Atreidæ. His calculation was that about one hundred laborers would be necessary, during three years, for removing the accumulated debris in the acropolis and in the lower town. However, the Greek Archæological Society resolved upon taking the matter in hand, and has been engaged on the work since June last. Owing to the small number of laborers employed (sixteen) the work has gone on slowly. No gold ornaments have been found except a gold wire in spirals. The surmise that a prehistoric building would come to light has been verified.

On this subject Dr. Schliemann writes to a friend: "A fortnight ago I was at Mykene, and I have convinced myself that on the summit of the rock the foundations of the prehistoric edifice have really been found. But they have afterward been altered and evidently used for a Doric structure—probably a temple. The prehistoric building seems to have been the old palace. Of the walls no trace is preserved. On the other hand, at the south side below the summit, one-half of a hall and a little room have been brought to light which seem to belong to the old palace—all the more so as in the hall itself one-half of a round hearth, exactly as in Troy and Tiryns, is preserved.

"Of the walls of this hall, and of the little room also, a portion still exists. The walls have the same style of building as those of the Tirynthian Palace; that is, they consist of a lower part of quarry stone and clay, and above of sun-bricks; and they are first covered with a thick layer of clay dressing, and then with a wall-dressing of lime. This palace has also been destroyed by fire; and the heat was so fierce that nothing has been preserved of the wall paintings in situ. In the rubbish, however, several pieces of painted wall plastel were found. I also found some such at Mykene in 1876."

No further excavations have been made on the slope of the castle rock. On the lower terrace, where the laborers were afterwards set to work—that is, to the right of Dr. Schliemann's former excavations—a small house with three little rooms was discovered. In the largest of these the fireplace is in the centre (as is always the case), and in good preservation. With the exception of some fragments of terra cotta vases and idols, no finds dating back to a prehistoric epoch have been made. A Doric capital was found, which seems to belong to the later building on the summit of the rock.

How Iron Breaks.

Hundreds of existing railway bridges which carry twenty trains a day with perfect safety would break down quickly under twenty trains per hour. This fact was forced on my attention nearly twenty years ago, by the fracture of a number of iron girders of ordinary strength, under a five-minute train service. Similarly, when in New York last year, I noticed, in the case of some hundreds of girders on the elevated railway, that the alternate thrust and pull on the central diagonals from trains passing every two or three minutes had developed weaknesses which necessitated the bars being replaced by stronger ones after very short service. Somewhat the same thing had to be done recently with a bridge over the river Trent, but the train service being small, the life of the bars was measured by years instead of months. If ships were always

A Pretty Woman's Secret.

Fear of discovery, when she resorts to false hair and dyes, is a source of constant anxiety to her. The very persons from whom she most desires to hide the waning of her charms are the ones most likely to make the discovery. But there is no reason why she should not regain and retain all the beauty of hair that was her pride in youth. Let her use AYER'S HAIR VIGOR, and, not only will her hair cease to fall out, but a new growth will appear where the scalp has been denuded; and locks that are turning gray, or have actually grown white, will return to their pristine freshness and brilliance of color. ETIQUETTE NOTES.

Say woman or lady, not "female," when speaking of a girl or woman.

Take off your overcoat and overshoes and leave them in the hall before entering a parlor.

In introductions gentlemen are presented to ladies ; young men to older men ; young women to older ones.

Do not tilt your chair, sit on it in an easy position., keeping your feet as quiet as possible, also your hands. Both may of course be moved quietly, but not so frequently as to attract notice. Above all, do not lounge or take ungainly attitudes. If you must do this, do it in your own room, where you will annoy no one.

The following are from a very sensible little manual written by a well known literary man, and entitled "Don't" :

"Don't repeat the scandals and malicious rumors of the hour."

"Don't discuss equivocal people or broach topics of questionable propriety."

"Don't be witty at another's expense ; don't ridicule anyone ; don't infringe in any way the harmony of the company."

"Don't be longwinded. When you have a story to tell, do not go into every detail and branch off at every word—be direct, compact, clear, and get to the point as soon as possible."

"Don't cling to one subject ; don't talk about matters that people generally are not interested in ; don't, in short, be a bore."

An Auction Story.

The auction is a mine for story-tellers, and the tale which follows is a good one, which will not be hurt by prefacing it with another. In a college recitation the professor, a dignified man of few words, had asked a question relating to the reign of Charles I. of England. The student answered without hesitation, and his answer was wrong.

"In the year 1618," he said.

"Impossible," said the professor, "Charles was not yet king."

"1619," ventured the student, who knew he was working in the right direction.

The professor shook his head.

"1620," the student advanced.

"No," said the instructor, without looking up.

"Twenty-one."

Raising his eyes from the desk to the student, who was becoming conscious of his ridiculous position, the dignified professor said slowly and with some severity,

"Mr. Sanford, are you at an auction ?"

Mr. Sanford resumed his seat amid a roar of laughter, and the profesor called for another victim.

Six million barrels of beer are consumed annually in this city, at a cost to the consumers of at least $80,000,000. Since more than half the population never drink beer at all, those who do average over $100 a year apiece for it, even allowing, as the Sun suggests, that the people who come from out of town drink a good deal of it. This seems rather an expensive luxury.—N. Y. Mail and Express.

be done recently with a bridge over the river Trent, but the train service being small, the life of the bars was measured by years instead of months. If ships were always among great waves, the number going to the bottom would be largely increased. It appears natural enough to every one that a piece, even of the toughest wire, should be quickly broken if bent backward and forward to a sharp angle ; but perhaps only to locomotive and marine engineers does it appear equally natural that the same result would follow in time if the bending were so small as to be quite imperceptible to the eye. A locomotive crank-axle bends but one-eighty-fourth inch, and a straight driving-axle a still smaller amount, under the heaviest bending stresses to which they are subject, and yet their life is limited. During the year 1883 one iron axle in fifty broke in running, and one in fifteen was renewed in consequence of defects. Taking iron and steel axles together, the number then in use on the railways of the United Kingdom was 14,848, and of these 911 required renewal during the year. Similarly, during the past three years no less than 228 ocean steamers were disabled by broken shafts, the average safe life of which is said to be about three or four years. Experience has proven that a very moderate stress, alternately from tension to compression, if repeated about 100,000,000 times, will cause fracture as surely as a bending to an angle repeated only ten times.

Minnie Lee.

BY J. R. WILKINSON.

I shall never see thee more, Minnie Lee,
Minnie Lee, with the gold brown hair ;
And thy violet eyes, so sweet and pure,
And thy face so wondrous fair.
I've loved thee long, and well, Minnie Lee,
But the dream was all in vain ;
And the busy years that drift away
Have left a weary ceaseless pain.

Do you remember a time, Minnie Lee,
When we wandered hand in hand
By a silver stream in the fair sunlight,
That wound through a summer land ?
The world was glad and bright, Minnie Lee,
Mantled in wondrous bloom
Of beautiful waves of foliage and flowers,
And laden with rich perfume.

The emerald fields stretched far away,
In the mellow, rosy rays ;
And the crown of the distant hills was lost
In a purple and golden haze.
The soft south wind toyed with thy hair,
And sighed among the flowers ;
And wandering on o'er the billowy lea,
Was lost in woodland bowers.

Ah ! sweetly, and gladly the song birds sung,
Aye, thrillingly glad and free ;
And gazing enrapt on thee, I knew
That time was Heaven to me.
But the summer passed and changes came
O'er the face of the world so wide ;
And an iron hand pressed cold on my heart,
And banished me from thy side.

I never shall see thee more, Minnie Lee,
And I'm tired and sad to-day ;
And longing for rest and finding none,
As the years drift slowly away.
I bow my head and the tears fall fast,
And my soul is heavy with pain ;
I can only see the gathering gloom,
My prayer was all in vain.

Just the Man He Wanted.

A burglar, who was doing a neat job on a large safe, was horrified, on looking up, to see a man standing quietly beside him. He was about to retire, when the gentleman said :

"Go ahead. I am interested in that job."

"Why ?" asked the astonished burglar.

"Because I have forgotten the combination, and no person living knew it but myself. If you can get that safe open, I'll make it worth your while."

FRIENDSHIP.

BY JOHN IMRIE, TORONTO.

Friendship ! thou holy bond that binds my heart
To others that to mine seem counterpart,—
Love-giving, yet love-getting all the more,
Thus daily adding to our mutual store
Of kindly deeds and words, each thought and look
As readable and clear as printed book ;
Enjoyable in life's gay, golden hour,
Yet doubly so when clouds of trial lower ;
Then closer draw, as lambs do in the fold,
To gather heat, and 'scape the rain and cold;
Till warmth and sunshine take the place of rain,
Then off to gambol on the hills again !
h ! Friendship ! thou art like a golden chain,
Each link a friend—each friend a golden gain !

An Electrical Crematorv.

An electrical crematory is said by the Philadelphia Ledger to have been devised by a process described as follows : The body, being shrouded in sheets made of asbestos, is laid upon a frame composed of firebrick, while at the head and foot are large copper plates, to which the leads from specially constructed dynamos of large electromotive force are attached. The body apparently occupies the position of the filament in an incandescent lamp, and, upon the current being passed through it, would be instantly carbonized ; while, as the air would have free excess to it, the process of destruction, or rather decomposition would be immediate. This process appears to have the recommendation of great rapidity of action, and freedom from many of the objections to cremation in the ordinary way, and admits of several little improvements upon all recognized forms of burial.

Work! Work!! Let every Reformer buckle on the armor for the next twenty-six days the lives of some of our countrymen had been taken did Sir John A. Macdonald's government move; then they did that, which if done a few days sooner, would have saved much bloodshed. Here is the opinion of Mr. Blake, Canada's greatest statesman, of the men who so neglected their duty:—"In the Commons House of Parliament I have told these men face to face, that before God and man I hold them responsible for every drop of blood spilled, every pang suffered, every dollar of treasure spent, all our loss of reputation, all our blasted hopes, because of this rebellion."

100 per year has been the average increase to the staff of civil service employees during the past seven years. When the Tory party assumed control in 1878, they complained that the number of employees—480—was too great. According to the Tory rule of reduction the figures 480 in seven years was changed to 1180. The hard working people of Lennox are reminded that these 1180 persons, whose office hours on an average are not more than five hours per day, are paid by the taxpayers of the county. Here is a comparative statement of the employees in 1878, during the Mackenzie regime, and in 1885, under Sir John.

THE CHIEF'S STATEMENT.

James Allen, Chief of Police in this town, at the dictation of certain interested parties, rushed into print last week and indignantly denied "everything." We repeat again that James Allen, Chief of Police, Napanee, did say that "there are about four hundred loose women in this town." The statement was made by James Allen to the editor of The Express, while standing near A. W. Grange's office window, on John street, during a conversation about the morality of the town. Furthermore we thought the statement was exaggerated then and still are of the same belief. After the Chief had denied making the statement he was spoken to about it, and said that he could'nt remember making such a statement, but did not "emphatically deny" having done so. In fact the Chief seemed anxious to avoid any conversation on the subject. This occurred in the hall-way of the Brisco House, on the afternoon of Friday, Dec. 31st, 1886. The Chief spends a great deal of time in talking and it would be hard for him to remember all the statements he makes during even a limited period. The reputation he has made for himself has been rather on the the line of "that puts me in mind of a story," than in the line of duty. We repeat again the morals of Napanee are

J. A. Shibley and wife are very much pleased with the climate in California. They can pluck oranges fresh from the tree, while we are enjoying the beautiful snow.

Everything is booming in our little town.

Connoly & Sons, have three teams doing the country with pumps. Messrs. Homan & Long are putting in a steam engine in their chair factory. Success to these firms.

A. C. Scott has completed his storehouse and put in a car of flour from the west, the first car of flour that has come over the N. T. & Q. R'y.

The name of the firm of Connolly & Benjamin has been changed to Benjamin & West. Their factory is running in full blast with a full staff of hands.

Our hotels are doing a good business under the Scott Act. Our merchants are also doing a rushing trade, From the very large orders they are giving commercial travelers, they evidently anticipate a good spring's business.

From all appearances our town eclipses most towns of its size in Ontario. It is noted for its neatness, sobriety and push.

Mrs. Joiner is improving. She was able to be out to church on Sabbath last.

The ice harvest has commenced and the ice is the finest ever seen here.

The Salvation Army is flourishing in great style here at present. They march the streets every night at 7 o'clock, and then go to the barracks, where they make things lively for a few hours. They are getting quite strong. Sixteen souls were reported saved the other night, and they are talking of building a new $700 barracks here in the spring.

Empey Hill.

The late thaw has rendered some of the roads in this vicinity almost impassable.

Walter Wilson who has been attending the Napanee High School for the past three terms, left his home on Monday to undergo a course of training at the Ontario Business College, Belleville. His many friends wish him every success.

Great credit is due Marcus E. Sexsmith for the high standing obtained by him as a result of the examination for admission to high schools, recently held in Napanee.

They say "there is a wedding on the tapis."

Notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, and the almost impassable state of the roads, an enjoyable evening was spent by "a goodly number" at the Empey Hill Church on the evening of the 18th inst., the occasion being that of a "basket social" held in connection with that of the Spencer Hill Sabbath School. After each purchaser had sought out and seated himself beside the fair owner of his basket, the assembly presented rather an amusing appearance. What a scene to behold! Brother and sister, husband and wife, maiden and lover separated by what? A basket social. The contents of the baskets having been unselfishly shared, the chair was occupied by James Gordon, the efficient Superintendent of the Sabbath School, and the following programme rendered:

Work ! Work ! !

Let every Reformer buckle on the armor for the next twenty-six days and a most glorious victory will follow for those who have the welfare of our Dominion at heart. If every Liberal will but do his duty faithfully until the close of the poll on the 22nd of February, the boodlers will be routed ; those who have mismanaged the Northwest will be supplanted by honest governors ; those who are spending the hard earnings of the people in junketing tours and costly house furnishings, will be driven from power. In a word, if lovers of good government will but use a little effort our fair Dominion will be saved from the degradation into which she is fast falling through the carelessness and extravagance of an incompetent Ministry. Do your duty, Reformers, and you will be well repaid.

$5 Every 15 Minutes is what the people of Canada pay for the travelling expenses of Dominion Government Ministers, Since the present government assumed office in 1878 the travelling expenses and cab hire for Ministers and their friends have cost, (see public accounts) $194,884 ;

Average for one year.....	$27,840 00
Average for one month (twenty-six working days)..	2,320 00
Average for one day (ten working hours).....	89 00
Average for one hour.....	8 90

Such extravagance as this our own Uriah asks the people to endorse. Workingmen, earning $1 for each day you work, can you afford to help pay $89 per day for Minister's junketing tours? Farmers, receiving 40c per bushel for barley, are you in a position to give your quota of $8.90 per hour for those receiving salaries each year greater than the value of your farms? Think of these matters seriously.

Negligence !

If there is one thing above another for which the government at Ottawa should be condemned by the people on the 22nd of February, it is for the mismanagement of affairs in the Northwest. Through the incompetency of officials and the deaf ears of the Ministers at headquarters, a rebellion of no mean extent for Canada was precipitated. Many valuable lives were lost, simply through petition after petition from the wronged half-breeds being pigeon-holed. That the administration were in possession of sufficient warning to have averted the serious trouble that ensued no one can gainsay. Even The Mail, though blind with partizanship, was forced to admit it, and evidence of an undeniable nature was forced from the Ministers themselves during the last session of the House. Had the Government listened to the entreaties of Mr. Blake, even after the trouble had commenced, and taken active steps, the serious results which followed might in a great measure have been prevented. But, no; these Ministers, bound up in self and the endeavor to satisfy the cravings of greedy boodlers, were determined to pursue their defenceless course. Not until the statements he makes during even a limited period. The reputation he has made for himself has been rather on the the line of "that puts me in mind of a story," than in the line of duty. We repeat again the morals of Napanee are not what they ought to be. We are cursed with the social evil in our midst, and it must be stamped out. If James Allen knows of these things and makes no effort to put a stop to them, he is no longer fit to be Chief of Police of this town. If he does not know of them, certainly his usefulness is gone. If he will grapple with this evil in a lawful way, he will receive a hearty support in the efforts he may put forth to make Napanee a moral town. If he refuses to do his plain duty, we will unhesitatingly do what we can to have his place filled by a man with some backbone.

SHAMEFUL IN THE EXTREME.

For consummate cheek and bare-faced trickery the deputy-reeve of this town is hard to beat. At the session of the County Council on Wednesday, quite a bout took place on the appointment of the second auditor. Finally Mr. W. F. Hall was appointed. This was not done, however, before unpleasant remarks were made by John D. Ham regarding Mr. Hall's system of book-keeping. To this Mr. Hall briefly replied, stating that the remarks were insulting and showing that the system was not calculated to lead anyone astray, as it was plain double entry. This was more than his mightiness, J. D. Ham, could stand, and as he felt that he had pliant tools at his back he must needs resent Mr. Hall's remarks in some forcible manner. He was not man enough to do it himself, however. In E. S. Lapum he found a ready henchman, one quite willing to "fire" Mr. Hall. Their heads were put together, and on Thursday morning they were quite alive, bustling here and there and doing considerable "talk on the quiet." Yesterday afternoon the bubble burst. Ham moved, seconded by Mr. Brydon, that the appointment of second auditor be reconsidered ; Lapum moved that the appointment of Mr. Hall be rescinded, and then moved T. G. Davis be appointed. The strings had been pulled so well that the latter was appointed to the position, and the gentleman who the day previous was appointed, thrust out. The motive for such action is quite patent to all who give it a thought. Mr. Hall is a Grit, and that is sufficient in the eyes of E. S. Lapum to disqualify him from any position. The council will we fancy regret this action, for in W. F. Hall they loose a man well qualified for the position, he being a practical accountant, and having filled the office for a number of years, while in T. G. Davis they have a man of but little experience and no ability, his only qualification being that he is a Tory. Such action as that on Thursday is shameful and disgusting to all lovers of decency, only capable of being transacted by those who have sunken low in principles of right and honor.

Centreville.

The annual meeting of Camden and Tamworth congregations was held in the church on Wednesday, 12th Jan., at 2 o'clock in the afternoon. The pastor presided, after devotional service. The minutes of the last annual meeting were read and sustained. Messrs Smith Gilmour, jr., and William Reid, were appointed auditors. The financial state of the congregations were found to be in a flourishing condition, and with a good balance in the treasury to begin another year. The contributions for the past year to the several schemes of the church amounted to $64. Sabbath collections to over $50. The minister's salary for the half year ending Oct. 1st, 1886, $400, was reported as paid. The congregations owe no man anything, being entirely free from all encumbrances. No socials, concerts, tea-meetings, or the like, have been held, such as other churches with larger membership are in the habit of resorting to at the public expense, for paying for the gospel, and maintaining a stated ministry. The steady-going Presbyterians of this section of the Lord's vineyard, with the pastor, have entirely abolished all such things, as aids in spiritual matters, believing that all such methods are wrong in the extreme, hurtful to the good of the cause, besides being unscriptural and highly displeasing to the King and Head of the church. For all temporal purposes in connection with a church and congregation, such entertainments of course are quite allowable. The reports of the auditors were on motion of Wm. Brown, sec. by Smith Gilmour, sr., received and sustained. The treasurers of the congregation was authorized to pay each caretaker of each church their amount for services rendered during the year. Messrs R. Reid and A. Gilmour were appointed to the treasurerships. Mr. Smith Gilmour, elder, having resigned his position of collector in his district, Mr. Smith Gilmour, jr., was appointed in his stead. Mr. Wilson Hyland and James Wilson were the collectors appointed for the 8th and 9th concession of Camden. Mr. Joseph Galbraith and Wm. Reid, (Chippewa,) were appointed collectors for Croydon and Chippewa respectively. The lady collectors for the missions of the church appointed at last annual meeting and comfirmed at this meeting, are as follows: Miss Belle Wilson and Miss Fingland, (district, embracing Camden 8 and 9, Croydon and Centreville.) Miss Hunter and Miss Sarah Milligan, Tamworth. As the ladies will begin their work of collecting shortly, it is hoped that all upon whom they may wait will be as liberal, if not more liberal, than last year. Let all give cheerfully what they do give and give quickly, remembering the good old adage, "He who gives quickly gives twice." The sacrament of the Lord's Supper was celebrated twice during the year, viz: In June and October and twenty new communicants have been received and their names added to the roll of membership. The minister's session and congregation rejoice in the increase of prosperity, both temporal and spiritual during another year, and pray for a double blessing from on high to rest upon them throughout the year, upon which they so auspicially enter.

COUNTY COUNCIL.

First Session for 1887—The Reeve of Camden Elected Warden—Motion to Do Away with the March Session.—Lively Time Appointing Auditors, TUESDAY, Jan. 25.

The members-elect of the Lennox and Addington county council, as given by us a couple of weeks ago, met this afternoon in the court house and filed the necessary certificates of office with the clerk, when it was Moved by Mr. Baker, sec. by Mr. Charters, that we now proceed to elect a Warden for 1887 without nomination.—Carried.

Three ballots were taken with the following result:

	1st Ballot.	2nd Ballot.	3rd Ballot.
Parks	4	3	1
Reid	6	7	11
Aylsworth I.F.	4	2	2
Carscallen	5	7
Filson	2	2	1

The Clerk then declared Mr. Jas Reid, Reeve of Camden, as Warden of the county of Lennox and Addington, for the year 1887.

Mr. Reid was escorted to the chair by Mr. Carscallen, when he took the declaration by His Honor Judge Wilkison.

The Warden elect expressed his thanks to the members for the honor conferred upon him. He felt the honor more at this time, as the county was not only paying off the current expenses, but also the county debt as it fell due; of which he said one-sixth is now paid. The fiscal year has also been changed from June to November, As several of the municipalities had heavy railway bonuses to pay, and taxes being high and barley low, he considered it to be a crisis with some farmers, and thought the councillors should not raise the taxes any more. He said the heaviest expenditure was on roads; last year the over expenditure was nearly doubled, owing to freshets. He held that the roads should be properly kept up, but an effort should be made to reduce the expenditure as much as possible. An other point suggested was the dispensing with the March session. If the council would which on motion was filed.

An account from J. H. Gallagher, for ink, amounting to 75c., was referred to the committee on County Property.

An account from F. A. Roe, for postage and stationery, amounting to $2.30, was presented and ordered to be paid.

Accounts from the Napanee Board of Examiners, amounting to $121.40, for the late examiners, was presented; from the County Board of Examiners, amounting to $55.15; from the Newburgh Board of Examiners, amounting to $83.83 were read. Referred to the Committee on Education and Printing.

The special committee appointed to strike the standing committees for the year reported as follows:

FINANCE—Messrs Ham, Lapum, Storr, B. E. Aylsworth and Sweetnam.

ROADS AND BRIDGES—I. F. Aylsworth, Brown, Baker, Filson and Parks.

COUNTY PROPERTY—Messrs Carscallen, German, Weese, Fraser and Detlor.

EDUCATION AND PRINTING—Messrs Kennedy, Brydon, Charters, Jackson and Allison.

The council adjourned till 2 p.m.

Council resumed at 2 p.m.

A communication was read from Messrs Deroche & Madden, stating that they had been instructed by Mr. John Grange to enter a suit against the county, for damages incurred to a horse which had its leg broken on the county road in Richmond.

Mr. Grange who heard before the council giving the facts of the case.

Moved by Mr. Lapum, sec. by Mr. Baker, that the matter of the claim for damages from Mr. John Grange be referred to a committee composed of Messrs Ham, Filson, I. F. Aylsworth and the mover and seconder.—Carried.

Moved by Mr. Baker, sec by Mr. Weese, that we do away with the March session, and that the committee on Roads and Bridges make their appropriation to roads at the present session. Laid on the table.

A petition was read from the Napanee S.trustees, stating that of the large number of pupils in attendance at the high school only a small proportion belong to the town, That in consequenee the tax-payers of the town are obliged to pay an undue proportion towards the maintenance of the high school. They asked the council to grant such aid as the circumstances warrant.

Mr. C. Fessenden, headmaster of the high school, addressed the council, giving the points relative to the state of the high school. He said the number of scholars was 128, with only four teachers. The rooms were crowded to such a capacfty that they could not put in any more desks. Several scholars from outside the county had been refused admittance.

Mr. A. L. Morden, of the school board, also addressed the council from a financial point of view. He said that Napanee had to pay the enormus sum of $1,735.00 for the tuition of scholars, a large percentage of whom were from the county outside, of the town. He thought in all fairness the council should bear half of the expenses over and above the usual grant of $225 given to high schools.

Messrs Burrows, I.P.S., and W. F. Hall, high school trustee, also spoke on the matter.

Mr. H. M. Deroche addressed the council on behalf of a petition from the Newburgh school board, asking for a grant, to aid in the maintenance of that school. A petition was read from Newburgh board, asking council to grant $150 over and above the usual grant of $200.

Both petitions were referred to the Committee on Education and Printing.

Moved by R. Filson, sec. by T. B. Germain, that Mr. H. Finkle be appointed a trustee of Newburgh High School.—Carried.

Moved by T. B. German, sec. by R. Filson, that Mr. J. D. Ham be appointed Moved by J. D. Ham, seconded by T. G. Carscallen, that Mr. Williams, headmaster of Newburgh high school, be placed on the county board of examiners.—Carried.

Council adjourned till 10 a.m. to-morrow.

THURSDAY, Jan. 27th, '87.

Council met at 10 a.m. Members all present excepting T. B. German. Minutes of yesterday's session were read and confirmed.

An account from Grange & Bro., for court house supplies, amounting to $11.40, and another for jail supplies, amounting to $17.15, was referred to Committee on County Property.

An account from R. G. Wright, for supplies, amounting to $1.55, was referred to the same committee.

An account from Jas A. Baker, for printing, amounting to $72.00, and also an account from T. S. Henry, for supplies, amounting to $10.70, were referred to the Committee on Education and Printing.

Moved by W. Brown, sec by R. Filson, that we go into committee of the whole on the second reading of the by-law to appoint a game inspector, and fixing the salary of said officer. The by-law was then read a second time in committee, clause by clause.

T. B. German entered and took his seat.

The first clause of the by-law appointing Luke A. Wheeler as game inspector was adopted.

The committee rose and reported progress and asked leave to sit again.

Mr. E. Storr's motion, re bills to be presented on or before the second session, was put and carried.

Moved by J. D. Ham, sec by E. S. Lapum, that the treasurer be instructed to present to this council a statement of the amount of taxes due from each municipality in the county, as well as the amount due by the county to banks, etc. other than debenture debt.—Carried.

The special committee to whom was referred the matter of the co-operation of this council, in asking the government to place a School of Science in Kingston, reported recommending that the Warden be authorized to sigh a memorial on behalf of the council, to send to the Governor in Council, in accordance with the ideas set forth by the projectors of the scheme, and that a copy of this resolution be attached to said memorial, and that the clerk be instructed to notify said projectors of the action taken by the council.—Adopted.

Council adjourned till 2 p.m.

Concluded next week.

other point suggested was the dispensing with the March session. If the council would make their appropriations to roads at this session, the March session could be done away with this year, as there was no particular points to legislate. And this is a heavy expense to the country. He felt confident he could not fill the chair with the dignity of his predecessor, but he hoped the members would over-look any mistakes.

The Warden then appointed Dr. M. I. Beeman, of Centreville, as auditor, which was confirmed by the council.

Several motions were made naming the second auditor, those in the field being Messrs Jas Hayden, Camden East; A. P. Booth, Odessa; W. F. Hall, Napanee; T. G. Davis, Napanee; I. V. Sexsmith, Selby; Thos. W. Beeman, Odessa; L. A. Carscallen, Napanee.

The motions for these gentlemen were all lost, upon which it was Moved by Mr. Ham, sec. by Mr. Filson, that the election of the second auditor be laid over till to-morrow afternoon.—Carried.

Moved by Mr. B. E. Aylsworth, seconded by Mr. Parks, that W. F. Hall be re-elected High School trustee for 1887.—Carried.

Moved by Mr. Lapum, sec. by Mr. Brydon, that we now elect by ballot a committee of seven, to strike the standing committee for the year.—Carried.

The following were then elected: Messrs Filson, Baker, Carscallen, Detlor, Ham, Parks and Sweetnam.

The clerk then read the minutes of the last session in December which were confirmed, and council adjourned till 10 a.m., to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, Jan. 26th, 1887.

Council met at 10 a.m., pursuant to adjournment. Members all present. Minutes of yesterdays session read and confirmed.

The arbitrators appointed at December session, to examine the matter of dissolving school section No. 30, of Camden, reported, recommending that said section be dissolved, as in their opinion it would be in the interest of education in that locality of the township. Filed.

A communication was read from Lieut-Col. Otter, asking for a grant of $10 towards the Ontario Rifle Association. Filed.

Letter was read from the Treasurer of the prisoner's aid association, Toronto, asking for a grant to pay off the debt on their buildings. Filed.

A communication was presented from the county clerk of Perth, stating that a delegation of engineers, appointed by municipalities under the Drainage Act of 1883, are going to interview the Government relative to having that act changed, and recommending that a delegate be appointed to represent the farmer's interest at such interview. Referred to committee composed of Messrs Ham, Filson, Parks, German and Charters.

Communication was read frem the clerk of Kingston, asking the council to assist in memoralizing the Ontario Legisiature to establish a school of science at Kingston. Referred to a committee composed of Messrs Ham, I. F. Aylsworth, Lapum, German and Dr. Kennedy.

Communication was read from Beverley Jones, Toronto, asking that the Torrens system of lands transfer be adopted by this council. Referred to special committee composed of Messrs Storr, Baker, Ham and Brown.

A letter was read from the county of Hastings, asking that this council assist the council of that county in memoralizing the Ontario Legislature relative to changing the system, whereby lunatics are confined in the county jail, owing to the want of accommodation in the Provincial Asylum. Filed.

A report was read from the county Registry of the year ending December 31st, 1886, Moved by T. B. German, sec. by R. Filson, that Mr. J. D. Ham be appointed as a member of the board of auditors for 1887.—Carried.

The Roads and Bridges Committee presented a report appointing Mr. Brown as chairman, and Mr. Filson as secretary of the committee.—Adopted.

Moved by E. Storr, sec by Mr. Jackson, that all bills and accounts be presented on or before the second day, and if not then presented must lay over till the next session. Laid over till to-morrow.

Moved by E. S. Lapum, sec by Mr. Brydon, that Mr. W. N. Doller be appointed a member of the board of auditors for 1887.

Moved by E. Storr, sec. by I. Parks, that Mr. T. V. Sexsmith be appointed as a member of the board of audit for 1887.

The motion to appoint Mr. I. V. Sexsmith was carried.

Moved by Mr. I. O. Aylsworth, sec. by J. D. Ham, that Mr. A. P. Booth be appointed as the second auditor for the year 1887.

Moved in amendment by I. Parks, sec by Mr. B. E. Aylsworth, that Mr. W. F. Hall be appointed as secodd auditor for the year 1887.

Moved by Mr. Lapum, sec by T. B. German, that Mr. T. G. Davis be appointed as second auditor for 1887.

Moved by J. B. Allison, sec. by Dr. Kennedy, that Mr. W. R. Membery be appointed as second anditor for 1887.

Moved by S. Weese, seconded by W. Charters, that this council select the second auditor by ballot.

Mr. Parks, in support of his motion, said that Mr. Hall had introdnced and the treasurer was now workinga new system of bookkeeping whereby the county expenses were kept separate.

Mr. Ham said that, after listening to the explanations regarding the new system he was fully convinced that another man should be appointed, as Mr. Hall would in all likelihood draw them into a system of which the council knew nothing whatever.

The yeas and nays were taken on the amendment with the following result:

YEAS.—Messrs. B. E. Aylsworth, Baker, Brown, Brydon, Carscallen, Charters, Filson, Lapum, Reid and Weese—10.

NAYS.—Messrs. I. F. Aylsworth, Allison, Detlor, Fraser, German, Ham, Jackson, Kennedy, Parks, Sweetnam and Storr—11.

The motion to appoint T. G. Davis was lost on the following division:

YEAS.—Messrs. Brown, Brydon, Carscallen, Charters, Filson, German, Lapum, Storr and Weese.—9.

NAYS.—Messrs—I. F. Aylsworth, B. E. Aylsworth, Allison, Baker, Detlor, Fraser, Ham, Jackson, Kennedy, Parks, Reid and Sweetnam—12.

The motion to appoint W. F. Hall was carried.

Mr. Hall in reply thanked the council for the position accorded him. He would have been just as well pleased had they not elected him, as he had plenty of his own work. He wished to reply to the statement dropped from Mr. Ham as to the system he had adopted. The statements he said were very insulting, casting several reflections upon him; as to the system it was nothing else than plain double entry. He said he would serve the county to the best of his ability.

Moved by R. Filson, sec by W. Brown, that the printing for the year be let by tender, to be received by Committee on Education and Printing.—Carried.

Moved by Mr. I. F. Aylsworth, sec by T. B. German, that we go into committee of the whole on the second reading of the by-law to amend by-law No. 109, assuming all bridges 100 feet or over.

The council went into committee on the by-law with Mr. I. F. Aylsworth in the chair.

After passing through several stages the by-law was reported and adopted.

MANHOOD

HOW LOST, HOW RESTORED!

We have recently published a new edition of Dr. Culverwell's Celebrated Essay on the radical and permanent cure (without medicine) of Nervous Debility Mental and Physical Incapacity, Impediments to Marriage, &c., resulting from excesses.

Price, in a sealed envelope, only 6 cents, or two postage stamps.

The celebrated author, in his admirable Essay, clearly demonstrates, from thirty years' successful practice, that alarming consequences may be radically cured without the dangerous use of internal medicines or the use of the knife; pointing out a mode of cure at once simple, certain and effectual, by means of which every sufferer, no matter what his condition may be, may cure himself cheaply, privately and radically.

This Lecture should be in the hands of every youth and every man in the land.

HOUSEHOLD.

Economizing The Morning Hours.

A raw young housekeeper is frequently overwhelmed by domestic details, with which an older housekeeper of mature judgment and large experience can readily cope, accomplishing the same amount of work in one-half the time, and with less than half the trouble and friction. This does not arise merely from the fact that the older housekeeper has acquired greater mechanical skill and swiftness, but, what is still more important, she has acquired the habit of forethought and the faculty of organizing. She has learned to carefully and judiciously lay her plans and make her rules and arrangements, so dovetailing the various details of her household work that one task will not conflict with another. For instance, before the fire dies out in the stove, she will carefully reflect over everything that has to be cooked or heated before the next meal, whereas, the inexperienced young housekeeper will perhaps only remember after the morning fire is all out that she wanted an extra kettle of hot water, or she wanted to make a dish of blanc mange, or some other dessert for dinner, early enough to avoid interfering with the cook when the latter sets about getting dinner. I will take this occasion to advise all young housekeepers to make an especial point of keeping on hand a perpetual supply of hot water. (I am addressing myself, now to country housekeepers who have not a range supplying them with this article.) Make it a rule that your cook shall always have at least one kettle of hot water on the stove, and that she shall always replenish this immediately after pouring out its contents. It is so little trouble to do this, and it will incalculably facilitate your domestic routine. It is very disirable to keep two kettles, so you need never interfere with the kettle of hot water intended for making tea of coffee. If you will insist on always having a kettle of hot water on the stove, you will so often have a sudden and unexpected need for it that you will be glad you have established this rule. For instance, you will sometimes want to draw a hasty cup of tea for an ailing friend, or some sudden illness might arise in which every moment of time gained was an object, and then you might find a kettle of water already heated of invaluable service. I have known a housekeeper thrown back an hour by having to wait for hot water after the fire had died out, when, by a little forethought, and by making the rule I have above advised, she would not have had to wait a moment.

A housekeeper should, early in the morning, arrange all her plans for the day and let the cook know the programme. Let her think carefully over everything that needs to be done that day, and try to order and time the various details so that there shall be no hitch nor conflict about them. For instance, if coffee is to be roasted, the best time to have this done is immediately after the cook has taken up dinner. The stove is then nicely heated and just in the right condition for roasting coffee. By setting the cook to do it then, both time and fuel will be saved, and the task will probably be completed by the time you have dined and are ready to give the cook her dinner. This is also a good time for making yeast.

Kitchen Hints.

PUMPKIN BREAD.—One quart stewed pumpkin run through a fine sieve, one quart buttermilk, one teaspoonful salt, one cup New Orleans molasses, corn-meal enough to make a thick batter. Bake in a Dutch oven slowly all night. In the morning it will be baked thoroughly, and ready for breakfast.

batter. A cupful is the usual quantity. Mix, and divide into six parts, and tie in six different small cloths which have been first dipped in boiling water. Tie lightly, leaving room for the dumpling to swell, and put into water which boils. Let the dumplings boil gently one hour and a half; then make a lemon sauce for them of a teaspoonful of flour, one tablespoonful of butter, half a cup of sugar, juice and grated rind of a lemon, and large cup of boiling water. Boil all up once, and serve hot in a sauce-boat, with dumplings.

Thrift and Economy.

Economy is not parsimony, although it is often falsely so called, and by many considered disreputable. It is a most commendable virtue, and should be most sedulously cultivated. It is not always a gift, and is as often acquired as inherited. It is the result of care, thought, industry, and unceasing watchfulness, and is, indeed, one of our highest duties. It is not only a "gathering up of fragments, that nothing be lost," but it is also a seeing that there are few fragments to be thus taken care of—the opposite of wastefulness and extravagance, and it is only the mentally weak who effect to despise and ridicule so excellent a quality.

A thrifty, economical person can make one dollar go twice as far as a heedless, unthoughtful person will. Poverty need not go hand in hand with careless waste and shiftlessness, though it generally does. If ever thrift and good management is needed, it is where money is scarce. Never "put your best foot forward" at the expense of self-respect. It may take a great deal of courage to say "I cannot afford it," but it is nobler far than to hide behind subterfuges, or go to unwarrantable expenses to cover up undesirable poverty, whose most galling sting is the fancied necessity of "keeping up appearances"—of sailing under false colors, and aping the expenditures of more affluent neighbors. Many whose good sense in other matters is indisputable, wear out body and brain in the insane struggle to keep up a style in household expenses and dress which is utterly beyond their means, and which blinds nobody to the true state of affairs; or, if it indeed blind a few, it is so transparent to others as to result only disastrously to themselves.

It is not the thrifty, economical class who, to-day, are paralyzing all branches of business with their insane demands upon "capital." The men and women who "gather up the fragments" are not of the howling mob who fight under the red flag, and devastate and destroy legitimate avenues of labor by their brutal onslaughts upon the very hands that feed them. It is not in their homes that discontent and anarchy are bred. The power which employs idle hands finds in their ranks no material to build upon. They have no time nor inclination to "fly to evils they know not of." With them the "gush" of the so-called "laboring man's friend" is regarded as so much "twaddle," or the wily cant of the vote-seeking politician, and, sooner or later, it proves to be the truth.

Winter Spearing.

Spearing through the ice in winter affords considerable sport at a time when other methods are stopped by the severe cold. It may be practiced with comparative comfort, and on the hundreds of small lakes to the north of us, with certainty of success. To begin then construct a small shanty of common siding, about five feet square, and with a small door for entrance. It should be made without other opening and without crevices, which would admit the light. This is floored having a hole a little

HERE AND THERE.

Gladstone celebrated his seventy-seventh birthday on Wednesday last.

A number of Eastern taxidermists are encamped among the Ten Thousand Islands, near Ponce de Leon Bay, Fla., slaying the now nesting feathery tribe by the wholesale.

A Utica firm has just made a rope thirty feet long with which Mrs. Druse, the murderess, will be hanged if she hangs at all. It is five-eighths of an inch thick, made of 615 strands of shoe thread, and is almost as strong as a wire rope of that size.

The Bishop of Moosonee in his annual circular letter, speaks of the reappearance of disease amongst the little community at Moose Factory, on Hudson's Bay, resulting in twenty-four deaths, seventeen males and seven females.

A carload of furs recently shipped from Winnipeg to New York, consisted of 437 bears, 65 silver foxes, 5,137 beavers, 800 foxes, 4,255 lynxes, 8,178 martens, 291 wolverines, 216 wolves, 65 grey foxes, and a host of small animals. It was valued at $71,000.

A man in Wisconsin was out hunting and a shower came up. He put his hand over the muzzle of his gun to keep the powder dry, when a heavy clap of thunder coming he involuntarily jumped, his knee struck the hammer of the gun, and his hand was blown to pieces.

Jeremiah Bansher, of Hamburg, Pa., was awakened the other night by his watch dog, which had set up a barking and howling under his window. Getting up and following the animal he arrived at his warehouse, some distance away, in time to frighten off two burglars.

He wasn't a journalist, only a common reporter, that wrote this:—Love is the precious loom whose enchanting shuttle weaves all the tangled threads of life into that exquisite lace of witchery which makes perfect and complete the glorious fabric of rapture and delight.

Winnipeg advices say that with the new year the Dominion Government will make a number of postal extensions throughout Southern Manitoba where railroad construction has taken place this year, extending the postal car service and giving a mail twice a week at all available points.

The Railway Age says that in the year just closing 8,010 miles of new main line railway track have been built in the United States. Kansas leads the country with the surprising amount of 1,520 miles, the greater part laid within the last six months. Assuming the average cost throughout the country to have been but $20,000 per mile, the expenditure for roadway alone was $160,000,000. Present indications show even greater activity.

Alsace-Lorraine must be a true paradise for sportsmen. Last year there were shot in the forests of the Reichlande 37 wolves, 1,199 wild boars, 152 wild cats, and 2,680 foxes, with, of course, an abundance of ordinary game. Lorraine has long been endeavoring to rid herself of predatory animals, but so far to little purpose, for French huntsmen are not so zealous in exterminating the wolf as they might be.

Two sons of John Haslam, of Waltham, Me., while driving through the woods the other day came upon two deer—one alive, one dead—locked together by the horns. The ground was all torn up around them so that the lead buck was nearly buried. The boy shot the live deer, and then found that the other had been dead several days. Its neck had been broken. They had to get stout stakes in order to pry the deers' antlers apart.

A serious difference exists between the buttermilk, one teaspoonful salt, one cup New Orleans molasses, corn-meal enough to make a thick batter. Bake in a Dutch oven slowly all night. In the morning it will be baked thoroughly, and ready for breakfast.

A great deal is thrown away, even by the poor, that in Europe assists to make good food. The skin and bones of fish, for example, put again into the liquid in which a fish has been boiled, simmered and strained off, will be as good to use as is much of that sold for gelatine. This may be used as a simple broth. It may be thickened with rice and flavored with onion and pepper; or, with the addition of a little flat fish and suitable spices, it will form a fair fish soup. Taken in any of the ways mentioned, it makes a nourishing meal, while, with a third of milk added, and warmed, it is a very comforting and restoting drink for an invalid. There is much virtue in despised fishbones.

A dish formerly despised, but which is beginning to be better known, is Toronto scrapple, a compound of fresh pork boiled to a jelly, seasoned, and thickened with prepared Indian-meal and wheat-flour. This food is considerod very healthful, and is bread and meat in one. It is usually fried a light brown, and may be eaten cold. It is excellent for men to carry who have to take their dinner to their work in fields or shops, and may be supplemented by apple-pie, or apples and gingerbread. To these hints we add a few "old-fashioned" recipes, which may be found interesting.

PIE CAKE.—One quart of sour milk, one teaspoonful salt, fresh butter (a lump size of an egg), stewed pumpkin, mashed very fine, one pint, four tablespoonfuls of molasses. Stir in flour—usually coarse, unbolted flour—until the batter is thick. Beat an hour to insure lightness (as no soda is used), finally mix stiff, roll out into a flat cake, and bake in the skillet, before the open fireplace, upon a bed of coals.

A BIT OF THRIFT.—When apples are frozen, many housekeepers consider them good for nothing. When thawed, press out the juice of the soft and seemingly spoiled apple. For apple marmalade boil down a quantity of the frozen liquid and thicken with fresh apples, pared and quartered. Stir until thick and smooth, season with bruised cloves, allspice, and stick cinnamon. Marmalade made in this way is finer flavored than that made from sound apples.

A delicate, clear jelly is made from the juice of frozen apples and two-thirds the quantity of white sugar. Boil until it jellies, then pour into glasses.

MIXED TURNIP AND POTATO.—Turnips in any form are supposed to be the appropriate vegetable to serve with boiled mutton. To many, however, the turnip is somewhat indigestible, and by others its flavor is objected to. It is therefore necessary to mix it with other things to tone it down, and potato is the best for this purpose. Mash the boiled turnip, and also an equal quantity of boiled potatoes; mix thoroughly. season with salt and pepper, and for each portion of the mixture add a piece of butter of the size of a walnut, and milk enough to make it quite soft. Put it into a baking-tin, add a small piece of butter, and bake to a delicate brown. This mixture, combined with egg and bread crumbs, rolled into shapes, and then fried, is acceptable as croquettes.

TO MAKE LEMON DUMPLINGS.—You must take half a pound of bread-crumbs grated, half a small cup of sugar, quater of a pound of chopped and sifted suet, the juice and grated rind of one large or two small lemons, a saltspoonful of salt, the yolk of one egg, and enough of milk to moisten the ingredients but not reduce them to a cess. To begin then construct a small shanty of common siding, about five feet square, and with a small door for entrance. It should be made without other opening and without crevices, which would admit the light. This is floored having a hole a little larger than a flour barrel. If so inclined you may provide a luxury in the shape of a small stove of sheet iron with stove pipe of about two inches in diameter. Being now ready for operations, convey the shanty out upon a frozen lake or river where the water beneath is from five to fifteen feet deep. Cut a hole through the ice to correspond with the hole in the floor of your shanty. Place the latter over this hole. If light enters between the bottom of the shanty and the ice, block up with snow. If the lake is covered with snow scrape off a space around the shanty to admit daylight into the water.

On entering this shanty the eye can distinguish nothing, in the almost total darkness, but the glaring hole and bright water beneath. In a few moments the outlines of objects are distinguishable, and on looking downward into the water, the weeds and bottom appear with almost startling clearness. No matter how cold without, or how wildly blows the wind, your may here take your comfort as thoroughtly as in you own snug home.

Having provided a wooden minnow, loaded at the bottom with lead, gaudily spotted with red and blue and having a bright tin fin on each side and a tin tail, fasten it by a line from three to six feet long (depending on the depth of the water) to a stick about eight inches in length. This is held in the left hand, the minnow is dropped into the water, and by bending the fins and tail a little, it is made to "rove" over a circuit of several feet by a slight continuous jerking of the little stick. A little practice will enable the novice to "get the hang of it," and a day or two will make him an adept. The minnow is thus made to dart hither and thither across the hole, and three feet or six feet below the surface.

A pike perhaps discovers the minnow and makes a dash for it, but the eccentric movements of the latter deceive him, and he misses the prize. Again and again he returns to the attack each time more slowly until a convenient opportunity is offered to strike him. Very often he comes to a dead stand-still below the minnow, following it slowly to the surface, if it is gradually raised and kept roving.

The spear used neccessarily has a short handle. It is kept with its point resting on the edge of the ice-hole ready for instant use. A stout cord is attached to the handle for its recovery.

Excellent sport can be obtained in this manner all through the winter months, and large fine fish taken, which being thrown outside the shanty soon freeze, and are brought to the table in better flavor than at any other season of the year. It is astonishing that this plan is not more generally known and practiced, being wholly free from the objections to netting as it is no butchery and does not unduly thin out the game.

There are several lakes near McHenry, in the State of Illinois, which are dotted with scores of these shanties from the time the ice becomes fairly solid until spring warns their owners to remove to a better foundation.

"Wealthy Merchant—"What! You here again! Why I kicked you down stairs and out into the street this morning, you impudent fellow."

Peddler—"Ish dot so? Vat a splendid memory! I had forgotten all apout it. Don't you vant to puy a fedder duster pefore you kick me out some more."

that the lead buck was nearly buried. The boy shot the live deer, and then found that the other had been dead several days. Its neck had been broken. They had to get stout stakes in order to pry the deers' antlers apart.

A serious difference exists between the Cabinets of Vienna and Berlin. It is claimed Prince Bismarck is serving Russian designs without regard to the interests of Austria. Herr Von Tisza, the Hungarian Premier, it is stated, will soon hold a conference with Count Kalnoky, and will insist that the situation be cleared up, and that Prince Bismarck be asked to declare whether Germany is an ally of Russia or Austria-Hungary.

Ida Newman, of Quihi, Tex., was bitten by a snake, and died, and Major Henry Brown writes thus to the Pearsall News: "I read in your last of the death from snake bite of little Ida Newman, of Quihi, and my heart almost bled for her parents, under the belief that if they had immediately applied a warm, wet poultice of tobacco the little innocent would have survived. Two just such bites were overcome in just that way near me at Belton in 1858."

At the Walker ranch, on the John Day River, in Oregon, a hunter named Marsh is resting up after a hard tussle with a black bear, which he smoked out of a hollow tree. He went in for a hand-to-hand encounter, and the bear not only broke his knife but cut and scratched him up most fearfully, and after sitting down on him quite a little while, went off to find new quarters for the winter. The hunter dragged himself to Walker's, where he will have to "hole up" for some time.

Lord Dufferin's health is in a very unsatisfactory state. He has been more or less unwell for a long time past, and it is clear that his constitution will not stand the Indian climate. There are grave fears that he will be unable to complete his term of office as Viceroy, but he is sure to stop in India until he is literally compelled to return home. Lord Dalhousie and Lord Canning and Lord Elgin all died prematurely because they insisted on working on at Calcutta long after they had been warned that they must leave India.

At a meeting the other day of all the leading citizens of Halifax the following resolution was unanimously adopted:—"That in order to secure the permanent unity of the Empire some form of federation is essential. That for the purpose of influencing public opinion in Nova Scotia by showing the importance and advantages of maintaining British connection by the adoption of such a system of organization, a society be formed to advocate and support the principles of federation. That this society be now formed, to be called the Nova Scotian Branch of the Imperial Federation League."

A shocking and fatal accident occurred on an up freight special on the eastern division of the C. P. R. on Monday night, two miles east of Nepigon. A carpenter named Gordon, from Port Arthur, was riding on engine 269, together with brakesman Frederick, Fireman Harry Brunell and Engineer Ramsay, when the crown sheet burst. The frightful rush of steam blew the three first named men out of the engine on to the track where they had to lie in the cold, with the temperature 40 below zero. All were terribly scalded and frozen. Gordon died two hours after with a broken back. The fireman had one leg broken, and was badly frozen on the face, hands and feet. The brakesman was badly scalded and smashed about the face, but was able to walk. The engineer escaped injury.

A young girl named Taylor, fifteen years of age, living near Grayson sulphur springs, Grayson county, was engaged to marry an Englishman named Rudd, stopping at the springs. The time was fixed for the marriage and all its preparations were made, when the girl changed her mind and refused to marry him. The Englishman applied to Squires Alley and Frost for a warrant to arrest the girl. They issued it, and the girl was brought before them to answer the charges preferred, whatever they were. Rudd insisted that the marriage take place then. She refused to comply, but the justices insisted that she must keep her promise or go to prison. The frightened girl finally consented, and the ceremony was quickly performed. There is no doubt whatever of the correctness of the above statement, and intense excitement exists in the neighborhood since the facts leaked out.

A despatch from St. John's, N.B., on Thursday last, says :—The small steamer, Sir John, left this port last night about 11 o'clock for Shulee, N. S., with a general cargo. When near Black Point, a short time after leaving port, fire broke out in the galley of the steamer, and rapidly spread over the vessel. The only boat was soon launched, but it upset and drifted away. As their only chance, Capt. Purdy then took the helm and steered for the shore, two miles distant. After much suffering from smoke and fire they ran the vessel on the rocks, when the captain jumped overboard and reached the land. The next man to jump, John Sinclair, failed to reach the shore and was drowned. The remainder of the crew, four men, then got ashore by a rope secured by the captain from the vessel. All of the survivors are more or less burnt. They had to remain on the beach in the cold till daylight. The captain reached here this afternoon. The steamer was built last summer, was valued at $10,000 and was insured for $5,000. She was owned by Captain Purdy and his brother, of Sackville, N. B.

KING'S EVIL

Was the name formerly given to Scrofula because of a superstition that it could be cured by a king's touch. The world is wiser now, and knows that can only be cured by a thorough purification of the blood. If this is neglected, the disease perpetuates its taint through generation after generation. Among its earlier symptomatic developments are Eczema, Cutaneous Eruptions, Tumors, Boils, Carbuncles, Erysipelas, Purulent Ulcers, Nervous and Physical Collapse, etc. If allowed to continue, Rheumatism, Scrofulous Catarrh, Kidney and Liver Diseases, Tubercular Consumption, and various other dangerous or fatal maladies, are produced by it.

Ayer's Sarsaparilla

Is the only powerful and always reliable blood-purifying medicine. It is so effectual an alterative that it eradicates from the system Hereditary Scrofula, and the kindred poisons of contagious diseases and mercury. At the same time it enriches and vitalizes the blood, restoring healthful action to the vital organs and rejuvenating the entire system. This great

For all diseases caused by the vitiation of the blood. It is concentrated to the highest practicable degree, far beyond any other preparation for which like effects are claimed, and is therefore the cheapest, as well as the best blood purifying medicine, in the world.

Heavy Snowstorm in England.

One of the severest snow storms that ever visited the country passed over England recently. The snowstorm appears to have done an amount of damage to the telegraph wires which is unprecedented. The telegraph wires in London were snapping with alarming rapidity, and in Fleet street the policemen curled the broken ends round the lamp posts. A train on the Midland line was delayed over an hour by the falling of telegraph wires across the track. There was very severe weather at Reading on Tuesday. The snow that fell in the afternoon was heavier than has been experienced for years, whilst the wind blew a hurricane, causing considerable damage to the roofs of houses. Trees were also badly damaged. In one cutting on the Great Western railway the trains were delayed by snow drifts. On the line from Paddington to Reading and from Bath to Bristol all the telegraph poles are a perfect wreck, most of the poles being splintered like matchwood and lying in all directions. The railway "block" lines being down, the trains are considerably delayed and are signalled along the line by flags. It seems probable that the wires between Bristol and London will not be restored for two or three days. The telegraphs in other directions have suffered equally as far as can be ascertained.

Woman in the Home.

A woman's life should be written in her home, her past with its warmth of sunlight, its shadows of memory, her present with its strength of service, its grace of sympathy, and her future with its calmness of coming twilight, its restfulness of hope beyond the night. No woman's life has full, visible expression without a home. Homeless women are denied their natural language, and speak with conscious effort, with sense of loss, a language less vital and human, like deaf mutes by sign and gesture. But emotion is more than utterance, life more than utterance, life more than its utmost expression. We may miss the rightful insignia of our home, but we cannot be disinherited. Those whose spirits are at home in the truth, the faith, the love which are immortal, have built for themselves, not tabernacles on the Mount of Transfiguration, but eternal homes.

A Discussion of Gender.

"Why do you call a vessel she?" said Henry to Fred, the other day.

"Perhaps because she wears a bow in front," answers Fred.

"That might be one reason but another is that she is not ready for business until she is properly manned."

"Yes ; and it takes a good many yards to rig her out."

HEALTH.

One morning in the winter of 1878 a Christian lady, who had often distributed to the necessities of saints, sat alone in the room, where advanced age and the beginning of what proved to be her last illness confined her.

Roused from her meditation by the entrance of her daughter, she said: "My dear, old Mr. and Mrs. W. have been on my mind all night. I hear they were not at church on Sunday. I know that they are poor; they may be sick and in want. I wish you would take a basket, call a cab, drive to the market, buy a good supply of provisions, and take it to them." Here she gave the address, and as her daughter was leaving the room, she added, handing her a thick flannel skirt, "Perhaps you would do well to take this, too; the weather is cold and Mrs. W. may need it."

The younger lady went. The provisions were bought, and at the head of the third flight of stairs in the tenement house to which she had been directed, she stopped short. Through the thin door she could hear Mr. W.'s voice asking a blessing upon the food before him.

At the conclusion of the grace, and smiling at what she now believed to be her mother's unnecessary anxiety, she knocked and entered. Sure enough, there they were at dinner, the wife at the foot of the table, waiting to be helped, the husband at the head, carving—one large apple, all the food they had!

With tears in her eyes, the lady drew forth her kindly stores, and while a comfortable meal was being prepared, she listened to their thanks, and heard from uncomplaining lips their pitiful story—how they earned a precarious living as clear starchers; how the husband had been attacked by rheumatism, and the wife by a felon; how, though utterly destitute, they had poured out before their God all their troubles; and how they had surely believed that He would send some one to help them.

This excerpt presents all the usual accompaniments of society as it is usually found: 1. "A Christian lady" in her "last illness" benevolently inclined, and accustomed to look after the poor. 2. Sends her daughter to the "market to buy a good supply of provisions," and take it to the old and indigent couple. 3. "The husband has rheumatism, and the wife a felon."

These conditions are in the strictest harmony with what is expected, and does happen in all grades of society as it is now constituted. These improper foods, illnesses and deaths, are the result of a lack of a proper understanding of the laws of health. The superabundant carbonaceous substances in the shape of animal fats, sugary preparations, starch and fine flour, cake and bread supplies, all of which are devitalized by the cooking process, causes the blood to become thick and dark, clogging up the capillaries, superinducing inflammations and abnormal strictures. Our green-grocer supplies are only once elaborated in the process of growth and are consequently insufficiently vitalized to supply such human tissue as God has made ample provision for; and upon the basis of which He, by implication, promised our first parents an exemption from a physical death.

The proper human food supply is designated in Gen. 1:29, and consists of ripe uncooked fruits and grains. These should be eaten in very great moderation, and not oftener than twice a day.

Usually, if fruit is eaten, it is eaten after more than enough of other and much less

SCIENCE.

A Russian engineer reports that he has discovered a process of reducing petroleum to a form of crystals which may be easily and safely transported to any distance and then reconverted into liquid form.

The oxide of iron is one of the most adhesive cements for iron. With this a join can be made so perfect that the iron will break before the cement will part. It is mixed with sulphur and sal-ammoniac moistened with water.

The diminished cost of production in metal work was illustrated recently by Dr. John Percy, in an address to the British Iron and Steel Institute, by the statement that a gross of steel pens, formerly costing $35, might now be produced for eight cents. The cost of making gold chains has been reduced to an eighth of what it was.

A series of experiments at a Russian military hospital, upon soldiers suffering only from slight injuries, yielded results which indicate that the habit of smoking has a tendency to retard digestion. The smoker required seven hours to digest a meal made up of the same kind and quantity of food which was digested in six hours by those who did not smoke.

Probably few persons realize how unreliable are the unprofessional thermometric reports which are telegraphed in Winter over the country after each cold wave, so untrustworthy are even the best of spirit thermometers in unskilled hands. Dr. John Rae expresses the opinion that the thermometer which is quoted as having recorded 58 degrees below zero in Manitoba is from 13 to 15 degrees in error. An instrument for the accurate measurement of low temperatures is needed as much as a reliable pyrometer for testing the temperature of molten metals.

The ratio of sickness rises and falls regularly with the death-rate in all countries, as shown by Dr. Farr and Mr. Edmonds at the London Congress of 1860, when the following rule was established: Of 1000 persons, aged thirty, it is probable ten will die in the year, in which case there will be twenty of that age sick throughout the year, and ten invalids. Of 1000 persons, aged seventy-five, it is probable 100 will die in the year, in which case the sick and invalids of that age will be 300 throughout the year. For every 100 deaths, let there be hospital beds for 200 sick, and infirmaries for 100 invalids.

One would almost imagine that the power of the microscope had reached its limits; but it is now claimed that, by the discovery of a new kind of glass, that power will be increased to an incredible degree. The new ingredients in the improved glass are phosphorus and boron, and the difference between the new and the old glass is found in the refraction of light. With the old glass the full power of the microscope was the discernment of one five-hundred-thousandth part of an inch, and with the new glass it is claimed that the one two-hundred-and-four-million-seven-hundred-thousandth part of an inch can be distinguished.

There is more in a heap of coal than most persons are aware of. Besides gas, a ton of gas coal will yield 1,500 pounds of coke, 20 gallons of ammonia water, and 140 pounds of coal tar. Destructive distillation of the coal tar gives 69·6 pounds of pitch, 17 pounds of creosote, 14 pounds of heavy oils, 9·5 pounds of naphtha yellow, 6·3 pounds of naphthaline, 4·75 pounds of naphthol, 2·25 pounds of alizarine, 2·4 pounds of solvent naphtha, 1·5 pounds of phenol, 1·2 pounds of aurine, 1·1 pounds of aniline, 0·77 pound

Usually, if fruit is eaten, it is eaten after more than enough of other and much less valuable tissue-building food has been taken. Under such circumstances, it is impossible to have the processes of vitalization by steeping in the vital fluids, and oxydation by breathing imparted to the blood.

A proper understanding of God's laws leads irresistibly to the conclusion that ample provision has been made for the daily reparation of the used up tissues with as good material as was used the previous day. If this high standard of excellence is strictly maintained, it is clear that sickness, old age, dicrepitude and death can be avoided.

This is not immortality; but it is "incorruptibility," the contention for which the Saviour always contended.

This story of an aged lady, charitably disposed, with ample means, is ill with what proves to be her last illness, instructs her daughter to go the market, buy a supply of food and take it to an aged couple of whom she had been thinking during the night. On her arrival she found the husband suffering from rheumatism, and the old lady with a felon, the three cases of illness being the result of the use of such food as is usually used,—suggested the foregoing thoughts, which are held by the writer as a result of 30 years carefully devoted to the study of the human system and its legitimate requirements.

How to Take a Bath.

There is a right and a wrong way of taking a bath. The wrong way may result in evil, but the proper mode of bathing is sure to bring benefit. A separate bath-tub is not essential in taking a good sponging. For healthy persons, who are accustomed to a daily bath, cold water would be best on account of its invigorating influences. Those, who can take a bath only once a week, had better use warm or tepid water, as it cleanses the body more thoroughly. In using warm water caution should be taken, to avoid contracting colds. The best way is to sponge the body with cold water immediately after the warm has been applied; have a coarse crash towel at hand and rub the body thoroughly until a flush and glow appears all over the surface.

A warm bath should not be taken in a cold room. It is well to have the temperature of the water correspond somewhat with that of the room. If the bather has no tub, but merely uses the sponge and bowl, great care should be taken to avoid exposing much of one's person at a time. Beginning at the head, sponge but a portion of the body at a time; rub and dry the moistened part, and continue this plan until the bath completed. Especially do we advise this method, when the combined, warm and cold bath is taken. We would lay some stress on the advantage of using cold water. It is much superior as a guard against cold. Weakly or invalid people should be warned, however, against using cold water if their system is not vigorous or robust enough to withstand its sudden influence. If it gives a shock to the system, the bather must desist at once. But if a pleasurable feeling is experienced and a glowing sensation follows, it is always the sign of a healthful and successful bath; no fear of taking cold need then be entertained.

A farmer at Dundee, Que., recently undertook to take home, without payment of the $5 of duty to which it was liable, some furniture which he had purchased at Fort Covington, but he was intercepted by a Customs officer and it cost him to settle about nine times as much as he paid for the furniture.

From the last named substance is obtained the new product known as saccharine, which is said to be 230 times as sweet as the best cane sugar.

A imple Story, Sweet and Sad.

BY GEORGE MURRAY.

Come, listen to my mournful strains,
A simple story, sweet and sad,
This tale of one who loved in vain,
Was told me by a harvest lad.

A gleaner brown, a rustic flower,
Loved a rich peasant's only son;
But she could bring no other dower
Than the fond heart that he had won.
She wept: The father said at last:
"Go, reap yon barley field of mine—
If, when three days from now have pass'd,
The task is done, my boy is thine."

The father spoke—The listening maid
With joy and love nigh swooned away;
Forthwith she seized a sickle blade,
And deftly plied it, night and day.
When, faint and wearied, in despair,
She felt her yearning strength depart,
She drew fresh courage from her prayer,
And prayer was prompted by her heart.

A daisy in her path delays
The tender glances of her eye;
"Price of my happiness," she says,
"Poor harmless darling thou must die!"
But while it perished in its youth,
It looked so beautifully mild,
That the fond maiden wept for ruth—
She, too, was but a blossom wild.

The third day passed—with twilight shade
The rich man to his barley came—
Breathless and pale, there stood the maid.
Her eyes triumphantly aflame!
"I did but jest, my girl," he cried.
"Ten crowns thy toil will amply pay,"
Alas! one more frail blossom died,
Cut to the heart, ere close of day!

Such is the story, sad and sweet,
I heard amid the golden grain;
The maidens sing it when they meet
And mingle weeping with the strain.

Calvin's Influence Still Lives There.

The small republic of Geneva spends annually one-fourth of its income for public instruction; this policy is not modern, but it has existed since the Reformation, when it was taught by Calvin that knowledge is the strength of a nation. Calvin himself created the college which bears his name, and installed in it the same building which is still used for the same purpose and called St. Antoine; it is the Geneva boys' pride to finish their studies in that establishment. The first degree of instruction is given to children from three to six years old in 56 schools, divided among the whole canton and counting over 3,000 scholars. The primary instruction is gratuitous and obligatory from 6 to 13 years old. At the end of each academic year (beginning of summer) examinations take place, after which prizes, consisting of books and silver medals, are delivered to the best scholars. This distribution of prizes is followed by a fete given to all the children of the different schools in the town. After meeting all in one of the public gardens they are led in procession through the principal streets, with bands and escorted by soldiers, to large shady grounds where games of all kinds are prepared for them. When playing is over they receive cakes, wines and fruit, and later in the evening a magnificent exhibition of fireworks closes the day, which is talked about during all the holidays.

A beggar, to all appearance slightly befogged, thus accosted a passer-by: "Sir, would you please give me a little money to buy a bit of bread, for I am so dreadfully thirsty that I don't know where I am to get a night's lodging."

bursting of a pulley which he was turning—a piece striking him on the forehead between the eyes. He lived but two hours after the occurrence. Deceased was 33 years of age, and leaves a wife and four children.

One day last week the people of Victoria, B.C., were treated to the novel spectacle of an imposing Chinese fuueral, which was conducted with all the barbaric pomp possible. The hearse was preceded by gong-beaters, men on horseback carrying flags and banners, and curiously-attired figures. Immediately following the hearse was a black horse, saddled and bridled, supposed to be for the use of the spirit of the deceased celestial. A line of carriages filled with chattering Chinese brought up the rear.

On Thursday of last week Mrs. Stephen Van Worden was found dead in the woods at Port Saxon, N. S., about two miles from the main road. The circumstances are reported as follows:—Since the death of her husband the deceased had resided with her son, Mr. Abram Van Worden, at Port Saxon, and at the time had been paying a visit to her daughter, Mrs. William Chisholm, at Clyde River, some three or four miles away. Having stayed beyond the limit arranged for, Mrs. Van Worden had sent one of her children to inquire if the grandmother was all right and still at Mrs. Chisholm's. It was then ascertained she had left for home two days before. A search was immediately instituted, with the result stated. The deceased was a native of Aberdeenshire, Scotland, and was more than eighty years old.

During the past year 77,221 cases of lobsters were packed on P.E. Island, valued at about $405,410. The number of fish killed amounts to over 25,946,256, averaging in size about seven to a can. The greater portion of these goods were shipped to England. Besides these some 14,703 cases, put up in Newfoundland, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, were brought there for shipment. On the whole the season has not been satisfactory, and in all probability the packers will soon hold another convention to consider their course for the future. Compared with last year the output has been about 1,430 cases more, but the fish have decreased again in size; for whereas in 1885 it took six and a half lobsters to fill a can, during the past year it took seven. In fact, ever since 1879, when it took but three to a can, the fish have steadily decreased in size, sometime by three-fourths of a fish to a can per year.

How to Dress Small Skins.

To dress small fur skins, clean and scrape the skin and moisten it with water; then cover the flesh side with a paste made as follows: One pound each of powdered alum and salt and of rye flour; mix into a thin paste with warm water, and spread it on the skin a quarter of an inch thick. Lay another skin upon this, and so on in pairs; then put a board on the top and a light weight. After ten days take out the skins, clean and scrape them, and repeat three times; then stretch the skins and rub them smooth with pumice stone and chalk.

How to Succeed.

A correspondent, who appears to be in earnest, writes: "As a new year has begun, I thought an article from your pen on 'How to Succeed' might prove of interest to those who, like myself, are always ready and anxious to learn, and who desire to commence 1887 with a laudable ambition to succeed, if success is within their power.' This is rather a strange request, as we are not aware that we possess any special qualifications for imparting information on this subject to our inquirer which he does not possess himself. We do not believe the good old way can be improved on; at least, if it can, we are not acquainted with the method.

We well remember the supreme contempt with which we regarded the teachings of some of the wisest philosophers who ever lived, when first reading their advice to those entering the race of life, who aspired to succeed, or occupy an honorable position. How commonplace seemed their arguments and recommendations? To be assured that to reach the goal, integrity, sobriety, persistence, attention to business, regard for truth and honor, a settled determination to make the word as good as the bond, were indispensable, seemed so ridiculous, so frivolous, so out of character with the end sought for, which we had expected to secure by a patented or pyrotechnic method, that we threw them down in disgust; and we have no doubt that thousands of others have had a similar youthful experience, and labored under a similar delusion. But the old, old story has been repeated, as it will be repeated to the end of time. The then esteemed dreary platitudes have materialized into the wisdom of the sage, and proven that the possession and exercise of these virtues are as essential, nay, more essential now, to achieve a lasting success than they were a century ago, because fraud and tinseled shams were not then as rampant, as dangerous, as positive or as deceptive factors in the make-up of society as they are to-day.

Napoleon's definition of genius—success—explains its significance when coupled with his well-known aphorism: "Providence generally favors the heaviest battalions.' The student who carries off the honors at Oxford or McGill more frequently owes his triumph to laborious, unflagging study than a special so-called natural gift, exemplifying the fact that there is no royal road to learning. When the Prince of Wales' sons entered the British navy, the instructions given to the officer under whom they were placed, in effect were: "Teach them their duty, and show no favoritism," thus practically recognizing that although born with silver spoons in their mouths, they had to learn by actual experience, equally with the humblest seaman, how to splice a rope or box the compass. And thus it is in the ordinary walks of life. Not more senseless was King Canute's command to the ocean than is the too prevalent expectation that a special freak of fortune will bridge the chasm between ignorance and knowledge, and afford a loop-hole for a genius (?) to prove his superiority over sublunary mortals.

History repeats itself, and he is a wise man who cannot learn by the experience of others. As the lighthouse warns the mariner of the hidden rock or dangerous shoal, so the failures of the past should act as beacons to those who are anxious to avoid the pit holes which constantly beset their pathway.

Many of the failures are the result of misdirected effort. There is an old though trite saying, "You cannot make a whistle out of a pig's tail," so a man who has mistaken his calling cannot expect to successfully compete with a rival peculiarly adapted by taste and training for it. Others trust to chance in preference to following the beaten path. A few years ago we in-out of a pig's tail," so a man who has mistaken his calling cannot expect to successfully compete with a rival peculiarly adapted by taste and training for it. Others trust to chance in preference to following the beaten path. A few years ago we inquired of one of the most prominent of Colorado's miners, what, in his opinion, had been the ratio of successful to non-successful mining adventurers, during fifteen years. The reply was that one in ten thousand would be a liberal computation. Is it not rational to suppose that if these nine thousand nine hundred and ninety-nine failures had turned their attention to legitimate business the result would have been far different? Some fail because too little attention is paid to details, others because they simply skim the surface and fail to use the subsoil plough.

Life is a continual struggle from the cradle to the grave, and the man who is not prepared to meet with and overcame obstacles has no right to expect success. No cross, no crown. While it is certain that everyone who starts in pursuit of wealth or fame will not become a Crœsus, a Bacon, or a Webster, it is equally certain that those who follow the divine injunction "Whatever thy hand findeth to do, do it with all thy might," and are guided by honor and principle, may rationally expect a certain meed of success to attend their efforts.

Catarrh, Catarrhal Deafness and Hay Fever.

Sufferers are not generally aware that these diseases are contagious, or that they are due to the presence of living parasites in the lining membrane of the nose and eustachian tubes. Microscopic research, however, has proved this to be a fact, and the result is that a simple remedy has been formulated whereby catarrh, catarrhal deafness and hay fever are cured in from one to three simple applicatione made at home. A pamphlet explaining this new treatment is sent free on receipt of stamp by A. H. Dixon & Son, 308 King Street West, Toronto, Canada.

Consumption Cured!

An old physician, retired from practice, having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma and all throat and Lung Affections, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge, to all who desire it, this receipe, in German, French or English, with full directions for preparing and using. Sent by mail by addressing the stamp, naming this paper, W. A. Noyes, 44 [illegible] Block, Rochester, N. Y. 48l6

—Messrs. Peter and F. E. Vanluven having purchased Mr. J. D. Wagar's interest in the co-operative warehouse are now the sole owners of the same. We understand that it is the intention of the Messrs. We wish them success.

—Albert College met with unusual success at the recent Departmental and University examinations. Out of nine candidates for matriculation in Arts eight were successful. Out of six candidates for second-class certificates four were successful ; and out of twenty candidates for third class certificates eleven were successful. For circulars address Rev. W. P. Dyer, M.A., Principal.

—The Christmas number of the Montreal Star was a gigantic success, being now in great demand at $1 a copy, four times the publishers' price, but it is to be eclipsed by the coming Carnival number of The Star. This, the Queen's Jubilee year, will not be soon forgotten by Canadians. The Carnival number of The Star will fix it indelibly on the mind of everybody. The Carnival Star is to be some forty odd mammoth pages, with five plate supplements, each worthy of a frame, and each good value for the cost of the whole paper.

—The Carnival number which is being issued this week by the Montreal Witness, will, we believe, command a most unprecedented sale, as it is published at the extremely low price of 15 cents, or two copies for 25 cents—all free by post. It is to contain 24 pages, literally crowded with excellent colored pictures and engravings of the principal scenes of the carnival, correctly as well as beautifully executed. The idea of sending two copies at such a reduction is a capital one; everybody can afford to buy one copy to keep, and at least one other to send to friends at a distance.

Band Concert.

—The band have decided to hold their concert on Feb. 10th. They are in communication with several prominent singers one of whom is Miss Braniff, of Toronto, and from the way in which they are working they will evidently give the people of Napanee one of the finest musical treats held for some time. Miss B. is a host in herself. The Toronto Globe, in giving an account of her appearance there, says : "She has a fine, light voice, of equal quality great compass and pleasing timbre. Her vocalization shows careful and conscientious study. Miss Baniff's rendition called forth strong and long plaudits, enforced by hand some boquets."

—The distressing paleness so often observed in young girls and women, is due in a great measure to a lack of the red corpuscles in the blood. "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" for children teething is pleasant to the taste and is the prescription of one of the oldest and best female physicians and nurses in the United States, and price 25c. a bottle. Consumption Cured!

An old physician, retired from practice, having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma and all throat and Lung Affections, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge, to all who desire it, this recipe, in German, French or English, with full directions for preparing and using. Sent by mail by addressing the stamp, naming this paper, W. A. Noyes, 149 Power's Block, Rochester N. Y. 48G —In our advertising columns will be found an advertisement from Mr. A. J. Empey, who some years ago carried on business in the blacksmithing. He has formed a partnership with Mr. Barnes, and opened in the shop opposite Potter & Williams livery stable. We wish the new firm every success.

—Ayer's Sarsaparilla is prescribed and recommended by eminent physicians, and is taken with perfect safety by old and young. It's cleansing and vitilizing effects are sure and speedy, and it is universally conceded to be the most effective of all blood purifiers.

—The many complimentary testimonials which we notice concerning the Dominion Business College, Kingston, goes to show that it stands at the head of all commercial schools in Canada. Young men should make a thorough investigation before deciding where to attend. 586tf

—Messrs. Peter and F. E. Vanluven having purchased Mr. J. D. Wagar's interest in the co-operative warehouse are now the sole owners of the same. We understand that it is the intention of the Messrs. Vanluven to buy grain on their own account next season, and as they now have the finest storehouse in the county and the very best facilities for handling grain will be prepared to pay the highest price in the market. We wish them success.

—Albert College met with unusual success at the recent Departmental and University examinations. Out of nine candidates for matriculation in Arts eight were successful. Out of six candidates for second-class certificates four were successful ; and out of twenty candidates for third class certificates eleven were successful. For circulars address Rev. W. P. Dyer, M.A., Principal.

—The Christmas number of the Montreal Star was a gigantic success, being now in great demand at $1 a copy, four times the publishers' price, but it is to be eclipsed by the coming Carnival number of The Star. This, the Queen's Jubilee year, will not be soon forgotten by Canadians. The Carnival number of The Star will fix it indelibly on the mind of everybody. The Carnival Star is to be some forty odd mammoth pages, with five plate supplements, each worthy of a frame, and each good value for the cost of the whole paper.

—The Carnival number which is being issued this week by the Montreal Witness, will, we believe, command a most unprecedented sale, as it is published at the extremely low price of 15 cents, or two copies for 25 cents—all free by post. It is to contain 24 pages, literally crowded with excellent colored pictures and engravings of the principal scenes of the carnival, correctly as well as beautifully executed. The idea of sending two copies at such a reduction is a capital one; everybody can afford to buy one copy to keep, and at least one other to send to friends at a distance.

Headquarters for Oysters.

Davis' restaurant is the headquarters in Napanee for the finest brands of oysters, which are received daily from the packing houses. Fine confectionery and delicious cakes, as well as bread of a superior quality. Fine Florida oranges and every kind of fruit in season.

eform Committee Rooms,

The Central Committee Rooms of Mr. D. W. Allison are, as we announced last week, in the premises lately occupied by Messrs Perry & Madole, on the corner of Dundas and East streets. They are comfortably heated and open at all hours for the convenience of friends of the cause. Those desirous of receiving information regarding the voter's lists can obtain it at the rooms, where there are parties in waiting to assist in the work.

J Websier, celebrated their fiftieth wedding anniversary. Quite a large gathering of friends were present, who were pleased to do honor to their esteemed neighbors. The presents were many, some being quite valuable. A very pleasant time was spent, the company departing with wishes for many happy returns of the day.

—Hon. Lou J. Beauchamp will again visit Napanee on Wednesday evening and deliver his farewell lecture in the town hall on Temperance. But few men can interest an audience like this gentleman, and we advise all who desire to spend an intellectual night to hear Mr. Beauchamp. Admission free. A collection will be taken to defray expenses, At the close of the lecture the organization of the Good Templars Lodge will be considered.

The Markets

The markets remain about stationary, very little grain being brought in. The only noticeable change was a slight upward tendency of oats. The prices offered are about as follows :—Wheat 80c ; Oats 28c to 30c ; Peas 50c ; Barley 40c to 45c.

Don't Marry

Don't marry too hastily, don't be too slow about it, don't marry a miser, don't marry an idle spendthrift, don't marry for spite, don't elope to marry, dont spurn a man for his poverty, don't marry without an eye to comfort, don't marry recklessly, don't miss seeing gallagher's superb stock of new wall papers, don't forget that gallagher' book and notion store is the cheapest place in town for school books, stationery, etc.

Band Concert.

—The band have decided to hold their concert on Feb. 10th. They are in communication with several prominent singers one of whom is Miss Braniff, of Toronto, and from the way in which they are working they will evidently give the people of Napanee one of the finest musical treats held for some time. Miss B. is a host in herself. The Toronto Globe, in giving an account of her appearance there, says : "She has a fine, light voice, of equal quality great compass and pleasing timbre. Her vocalization shows careful and conscientious study. Miss Baniff's rendition called forth strong and long plaudits, enforced by hand some boquets."

—The distressing paleness so often observed in young girls and women, is due in a great measure to a lack of the red corpuscles in the blood. To remedy this requires a medicine which produces those necessary little blood constitutents and the best yet discovered is Johnson's Tonic Bitters Price 50c and $1 per bottle at Perry & Co's drug store, sole agents.

$500 REWARD!

We will pay the above reward for any case of liver complaint, dyspepsia, sick headache, indigestion, constipation or costiveness we cannot cure with West's Vegetable Liver Pills, when the directions are strictly complied with. They are purely vegetable, and never fail to give satisfaction. Large boxes containing 30 sugar-coated pills, 25c. For sale by all druggists. Beware of counterfeit and imitations. The genuine manufactured only by JOHN C. WEST & CO., Toronto, Ont.

Not a Book Agent.

Perry & Co., Druggists, are not book agents, but have the agency in Napanee for Johnson's Tonic Bitters, which they can heartily recommend for any complaint to which a tonic medicine is applicable. This valuable medicine has been used with most astonishingly good results in cases of general debility, weakness, irregularities peculiar to females, extreme paleness, impoverishment of the blood, stomach and liver troubles, loss of appetite, and for that general worn out feeling that nearly everyone is troubled with at some part of the year. Don't forget the name Johnson's Tonic Bitters 50c. and $1 per bottle at Perry & Co's drug tore, Sole Agents.

"SHE"

Improbabilities Sometimes Become Real Realities—A True Woman's Fidelity.

Several works bearing unique titles, written in fascinating style, and giving evidence of wonderful imaginative power have lately been received by the reading public with much popularity and pleasure.

Perhaps the most striking of them is the book bearing the odd title of "She." In this the author has fairly outdone himself in his popular line. Ayesha and her beloved Kallikrates are unique characters in fiction Ayesha, the heroine, is a beautiful creature who tasted of the essence nature's forces at the fountain head, and became immortal.

Her patient waiting for the coming of Kallikrates, the beloved of her youth, whose individuality was maintained through centuries, though the change called death regularly occurred, only to be followed by rebirth, is a fine illustration of woman's fidelity.

The closing scene, when she conducts Kallikrates to the very centre of the earth, the birthplace of all life, in order that he may taste of immortality, is a fit climax to the fine creation.

The question naturally suggested by this strikingly original story is whether there is not somewhere in nature, a potent force whereby life may at least be temporarily prolonged.

Mrs Annie Jenness Miller, editor of "Dress" says: "In every instance Warner's Safe Cure has the effect to give new energy and vitality to all my powers. 'Mme. Gray, teacher of Oratory and Physical Culture at Syracuse, declares: "Before I tried physical culture and Warner's safe cure, I was a confirmed invalid. I owe much to that excellent remedy, and do not hesitate to acknowledge it."

Human life seems too short, though men in former ages lived longer than those of the present. History tells us that they lived more in accordance with nature's laws—their mode of living was extremely simple, and in their daily life they followed the dictates of human intelligence.

If sickness comes, we of to-day seek the remedy among the artifical forces instead of resorting to the field of nature.

If when diseases come, we would consult nature, the chances are that we would fare better, for we would then treat the cause of such disorders. Modern research has shown that most of the commonly known diseases owe their origin to the unhealthy state of the kidneys, the blood purifiers of the system and if they are kept in a healthy state by the use of Warner's Safe Cure, a vegetable compound and simple production of nature, much of the prevailing sickness would be happily averted.

It is probable that the author of "She" derived many of his beautiful imaginings from close communings with nature, for we are all agreed that whatever is of or from nature, is more beautiful and wholesome than that which is artificially constructed.

COMMERCIAL UNION

The Farmers Institute Invite Speakers —Grant from County Council and Government.

On Saturday afternoon last a meeting of the Lennox Farmers' Institute was held in the council chamber. The attendance was fairly good. The chair was occupied by J. Carscallen, President, and Mr M. Bogart acted as secretary pro tem. The minutes of the last session were read and confirmed.

Mr Carscallen stated that some time ago he received a communication, from western Ontario, stating that a central Farmers' Institute was about to be organised in Toronto and asked this institute to send a delegate. This communication was not received until about two or three days previous to the session, and he, being unable to go, the institute had no representative.

The secretary read a circular, from the secretary of the central union, containing the minutes of the first session, and also the objects of the union.

Mr Bogart stated that some time ago he wrote to Mr Shaw, of Hamilton, secretary of the commercial union club, of Toronto, asking him and Mr Fuller, president of the central Farmers' Institute, to pay Napanee a visit in the interests of commercial union and cheese and butter making.

The secretary received a reply that Mr. Fuller could not come this fall. Mr. Shaw said he would come and asked if the institute would get other speakers, or if he would make the supply.

It was suggested that opposition speakers be secured if at all possible.

It was the general impression that it would be of more interest to the farmers, to have Commercial Union for the subject than butter and cheese.

Mr Pringle thought it better to have Messrs. Shaw and Prof. Smith and that the Toronto World be asked to send a man in opposition.

Moved by R. Switzer, seconded by C. W. Neville, that the meeting be held on Friday and Saturday, December 16th and 17th. The first days speaking to be held in the village of Odessa, and the second in Napanee. both discussions to be on Commercial Union. Carried.

A communication was read from Mr. J. Mills, of the Ontario Agricultural College, stating that the programme was now being made out and they would endeavor to send a man to address a meeting, in the interest of the institute of this place.

Moved by George Lott, seconded by R. Switzer, that the treasurer collect from the members their membership fees, Moved in amendment by Mr. Dunbar seconded by C. W Neville, that a pass book be furnished each director and that the names of the members be entered thereein and that the directors collect the fees.

The amendment was carried.

On motion J. Dunbar was added to the board of directors for North Fredericksburgh, and B. E. Alysworth for Ernesttown.

On motion the president, Mr Bogart and C2ristains and Temperance Workers.

What are you doing for the young men of Napanee? You are no doubt doing something toward keeping them from drinking habits, but what are you giving them as a substitute, which will tend to keep them in the right direction. We all know and must admit, that it is impossible to keep them at home, after their day's work is done. They want companions, and companions they will have, and when out with these friends they generally find some resort where they can have a social chat and some amusement.

The only places which are now open to them, continually, are such as will influence them for evil rather than good, and where they find companions not desirable for any young men, and who will gradually draw them away from all that is good and ennobling.

Our young men must and will have companions, and they will have amusement; then why not give them in their proper place and without any evil influences.

Those who profess to care for these young men, should put their hands into their pockets, and prove their interest in their cause, by providing a set of rooms, where the young men will be able to have innocent amusement, literature of the day, companionship, and these all surrounded by christain influences.

The writer thinks there is nothing to compare in this way with a Young Men's Christain Association, where christain young men are working for the good of their fellows.

In an organization of this kind, you have almost, if not all, that is required, for the young men of Napanee, or any other town, and they would here be influenced continually for good, as well as be improved mentally, physically, morally, and spiritually.

The room should be supplied with the leading daily papers, with religious and secular periodicals, (carefully selected) and a number of innocent games, such as checkers, chess, cro[illegible]inole, dominoes, etc.

There is, [illegible]o doubt, a great necessity for some such plac[illegible]s in all towns and cities, and if the christain pe[illegible]ple, and those who profess to care so mu[illegible] for the young men, will not take some ste[illegible] in this direction, from whom can it be expe[illegible]ted, and to whom can we look for help.

I would like to hear soon of so[illegible]e decided steps being taken, and I hope the[illegible] some christian young men of Napanee will be found, who are earnestly interested in their fellows to carry on the work.

Yours truly, K[illegible]

M Bogart brought up the subject of establishing creameries in the county. He understood that creameries were in operation in the west, assisted by the government, and it would be well to get figures as he understood that creameries were more profitable than cheese factories. Mr Fuller would be able to give full information regarding the matter.

Mr Doller stated that according to the latest figures, cheese factories were more profitable than creameries.

The institute adjourned, and the Commercial union committee was instructed to meet next Saturday afternoon at 2 p.m.

OBITUARY.

FREDONIA R. BALDWIN.

We glean the following facts from The Pacific Methodist of a recent date: Mrs Baldwin died at Stockton, Kansas, on Tuesday, October 15, 1887. She was the daughter of Garret and Emeline German, of North Fredericksburgh, and sister of Thomas B. German, deputy-reeve of that township. In December, 1874, the subject of this notice was married to Joseph Baldwin, and resided with him in this county until April, 1886, when they removed to Stockton. Deceased was an earnest christian and died trusting in her Saviour.

A Matter of Economy.

As a matter o economy B.B.B. is the cheapest medicine in use for it takes less to cure chronic diseases of the stomach, liver, kidneys and blood, than of any other known remedy. B. B. B. is only one dollar a bottle.

NUTTIE'S FATHER.

"O don't leave off, mother. Do tell me. How long did you have him?"

"Six weeks then—and afterwards one fortnight at Dieppe. He was not free. He had an old uncle, General Egremont, who was sick and hot tempered, and he was obliged to keep everything secret from him, and therefore from everybody else. And so I was to live at Dieppe, while he went out to take care of his uncle, and you know——you know———"

"Yes, I know, dear mother. But I am sure he was saving somebody else, and it was a noble death! And I know how Aunt Ursel came to Dieppe, and how I—your own little Frenchwoman—came to take care of you. And haven't we been jolly without any of these fine relations that never looked after you all this time! Besides, you know he is very likely to be on a lonely coral island, and will come home yet. I often think he is."

"My dear child, I have been happier than I deserved," said Alice Egremont, drying her eyes. "But oh! Nuttie. I hope you will be a wiser woman than your mother."

"Come, don't go on in that way! Why, I've such advantages! I've Miss Mary, and Aunt Ursel, and Mr. Spyers, and Mr. Dutton, and you, you poor little thing, had nobody! One good thing is, we shall get the water-soldier. Mr. Dutton needn't come, for he's like a cat, and won't soil his boots, but Gerard is dying to get another look at the old ruin. He can't make up his mind about the cross on one of the stone-coffin lids, so he'll get it out of the pond for us. I wonder when we can go. To-night is choir practice, and to-morrow is cutting-out day.

Miss Headworth was not sorry that the small sociabilities of the friends did not leave her alone with her niece all that evening, or the next day, when there was a grand cutting-out for the working party,—an operation always performed in the holidays. Miss Headworth had of late years been excused from it, and it gave her the opportunity she wanted of a consultation with Mr. Dutton. He was her prime adviser in everything, from her investments (such as they were) to the eccentricities of her timepieces; and as the cuckoo-clock had that night cuckooed all the hours round in succession, no one thought it wonderful that she should send a twisted note entreating him to call as early as he could in the afternoon. Of course Nuttie's chatter had proclaimed the extraordinary visitors, and it needed not the old lady's dash under 'on an anxious affair' to bring him to her little drawing-room as soon as he could quit his desk. Perhaps he hastened his work with a hope in his heart which he durst not express, but the agitation on the usually placid face forbade him to entertain it for an instant, and he only said "So our expedition has led to unforeseen consequences, Miss Headworth." And then she answered under her breath, as if afraid of being overheard: "Mr. Dutton, my poor child does not know it yet, but the man is alive!"

Mr. Dutton compressed his lips. It was the greater shock, for he had actually made inquiries at the Yacht Club, but the officials there either had not been made aware of the reappearance of the two Egremonts, or they did not think it worth while to look beyond the record which declared that all hands had perished, and the connection of the uncle and nephew with the Yacht Club had not been renewed. Presently he said, "Then hers was a right instinct. There is reason to be thankful."

and looked at the door, as if she expected to see him appear that instant, clad in skins like Robinson Crusoe, but her aunt's nervous agitation found vent in a sharp reproof: "Nuttie, hold your tongue, and don't be such a foolish child, or I shall send you out of the room this instant!"

"But aunt?" gasped Alice, unable to bear the suspense.

"Yes, my poor dear child, Captain Egremont with the General got off with some of the crew in a boat when the Ninon was burnt. He spent a good many years abroad with the old man, but he has now inherited the family place, and is living there." Miss Headworth felt as if she had fired a cannon and looked to see the effect.

"Ah, if we could have stayed at Dieppe!" said Mrs. Egremont. "But we did write back to say where we could be heard of."

"That was of no use. Mark found no traces of us when he went thither."

"Did he send Mark?"

"No. My dear Alice, I must not conceal from you that this is all Mr. Mark Egremont's doing. He seems to have been helping his uncle with his papers when he came on the evidence of your marriage, and, remembering you as he does, he forced the confession of it from the captain, and of his own accord set forth to discover what had become of you and to see justice done to you."

"Dear little Mark!" said she; "he always was such an affectionate little boy."

"And now, my dear, you must consider how you will receive any advances on his part."

"Oh, Aunt Ursel, don't! I can't talk now. Please let me go to bed. Nuttie, dear, you need not come yet."

The desire for solitude, in which to realize what she had heard, was overpowering, and she fled away in the summer twilight, leaving Nuttie with wide open eyes, looking after her vanished hero and desert island.

"My poor Alice!" sighed the old lady.

"Aunt Ursel!" exclaimed Nuttie, "was—I mean—is my father a good or a bad man?"

"My dear, should a daughter ask such a question?"

"Aunt Ursel, I can't help it. I think I ought to know all about it," said Nuttie gravely, putting away her childishness and sitting down by her aunt. "I did not think so much of it when mother told me they eloped, because, though I know it was very wrong, people do do odd things sometimes when they are very much in love (she said it in a superior patronising tone that would have amused Miss Headworth very much at any other time); and it has not spoilt mother for being the dearest, sweetest, best thing in the world, and, besides, they had neither of them any fathers or mothers to disobey. But, then, when I found he was so old, and that he kept it a secret, and must have told stories only for the sake of money (uttered with extreme contempt,) I didn't like it. And if he left her as Theseus left Ariadne, or Sir Lancelot left Elaine, I—I don't think it is nice. Do you think he only pretended to be lost in the Ninon to get rid of her, or that he could not find her?"

"The Ninon was really reported lost with all on board," said Miss Headworth. "That was ascertained. He was saved by a Chilian ship, and seems to have been a good while making his way back to Europe. I had taken care that our address should be known at Dieppe, but it is quite possible that he may not have applied to the right people or that they may not have preserved my letter, so that we cannot feel sure that he was to blame."

"If he had been worth anything at all, he would have moved heaven and earth to find her!" cried Nuttie; "and you said

Leave was given, half reluctantly, and with a prohibition against mentioning the subject to any one else, but both mother and aunt had confidence in Mary Nugent's wisdom and discretion, so the two friends sat on the wall together, and Ursula poured out her heart. Poor little girl! she was greatly discomfited at the vanishing of her noble vision of the heroic self-devoted father, and ready on the other hand to believe him a villain, like Bertram Risingham, or "the Pirate," being possessed by this idea on account of his West Indian voyages. At any rate, she was determined not to be accepted or acknowledged without her mother, and was already rehearsing letters of refusal Miss Mary listened and wondered, feeling sometimes as if this were as much a romance as the little yacht going down with the burning ship; and then came back the recollection that there was a real fact that Nuttie had a father, and that it was entirely uncertain what part he might take, or what the girl might be called on to do. Considering anxiously these bearings of the question, she scarcely heard what she was required to assent to, in one of Nuttie's eager, "Don't you think so?"

"My dear Nuttie," she said, rousing herself, "what I do think is that it will all probably turn out exactly contrariwise to our imaginations, so I believe it would be wisest to build up as few fancies as possible, but only to pray that you may have a right judgment in all things, and have strength to do what is right, whatever you may see that to be."

"And of course that will be to stick by mother."

"There can be little doubt of that, but the how? No, dear, do not let us devise all sorts of hows when we have nothing to go upon. That would be of no use, and only perplex you when the time comes. It would be much better to "do the nexte thinge," and read our Marie Stuart."

Nuttie pouted a little, but submitted, though she now an then broke into a translation with "You know mother will never stand up for herself," or "They think I shall be asked to stay with the Egremonts, but I must work up for the exam."

However, the school habit of concentrating her attention prevailed, and the study quieted Nuttie's excitement. The expedition took place as arranged. There was a train which stopped so that the party could go down by it, and the distance was not too great for walking back.

Mr. Dutton met them on the platform, well armed with his neat silk umbrella, and his black poodle, Monsieur, trotting solemnly after him. Gerard Godfrey bore materials for an exact transcript of the Abbot's monumental cross, his head being full of church architecture, while Nuttie carried a long green tin case, or vasculum as she chose to call it, with her three vowels, U A E, and the stars of the Little Bear conspicuously painted on it in white.

"You did not venture on that the other day," said Mr. Dutton. "How much of the park do you mean to carry away in it?"

"Let me take it," said Gerard politely.

"No, thank you. You'd leave it behind, while you were pottering over the mouldings."

"You are much more likely to leave it behind yourself."

"What—with my soldier, my Stratiotes, in it? I think I see myself."

"Give it to me," said Gerard. "Of course I can't see you carrying a great thing like that."

"Can't you, indeed?"

"Gently, gently, my dear," said Miss Mary, as the young people seemed very near a skirmish, and the train was sweeping up. Then there was another small scuffle, for Nuttie had got her heart on the third hands had perished, and the connection of the uncle and nephew with the Yacht Club had not been renewed. Presently he said, "Then hers was a right instinct. There is reason to be thankful."

Miss Headworth was too full of her own anxieties to heed his causes for thankfulness. She told what she had heard from Lady Kirkaldy and from Mark Egremont, and asked counsel whether it could be Alice's duty to return to the man who had deserted her, or even to accept anything from him. There was an impetuous and indignant spirit at the bottom of the old lady's heart, in spite of the subdued life she had led for so many years, and she hardly brooked the measured considerate manner in which Captain Egremont made the first move. At present no one was acting but young Mark, and, as Mr. Dutton observed, it was not a matter in which a man was very likely to submit to a nephew's dictation.

There was certainly no need for Mrs. Egremont to force her presence on him. But Mr. Dutton did think that for her own sake and her child's there ought to be full recognition of their rights, and that this should be proved by their maintenance.

"I imagine that Ursula may probably be a considerable heiress, and her rights must not be sacrificed."

"Poor little girl! Will it be for her happiness? I doubt it greatly!"

"Of that I suppose we have no right to judge," said Mr. Dutton, somewhat tremulously. "Justice is what we have to look to, and to allow Nuttie to be passed over would be permitting a slur to be cast on her and her mother."

"I see that," said Miss Headworth, with an effort. "I suppose I am after all a selfish, faithless old woman, and it is not in my hands after all. But I must prepare my poor Alice for what may be coming."

"If any terms are offered to her, she had better put the matter into the lawyer's hands. Dobson would be a safe man to deal with."

Miss Headworth was amazed that he—who had helped her in many a little question bordering on law—should not proffer his aid now in this greatest stress. He was a resolute, self-controlled man, and she never guessed at the feeling that made him judge himself to be no fitting champion for Alice Egremont against her husband. Ever since, ten years ago, he had learned that his beautiful neighbour did not regard herself so certainly a widow as to venture to open her heart to any other love, he had lived patiently on, content to serve her as a trustworthy friend, and never betraying the secret hope so long cherished and now entirely crushed.

He was relieved to escape from the interview, and the poor old lady remained a little more certain as to her duty perhaps, but with a certainty that only made her more unhappy, and she was so restless and nervous that, in the middle of the evening's reading of Archbishop Trench's Lectures on History, Alice suddenly broke off in the very middle of a sentence and exclaimed, "Aunt Ursel! you are keeping something from me."

Miss Headworth made a faint attempt by saying something about presently, and glancing with her eyes to indicate that it was to be reserved till after Nuttie's bedtime, but the young lady comprehended the signs and exclaimed, "Never mind me, Aunt Ursel,—I know all about mother; she told me last night."

"It is!" broke in Mrs. Egremont, who had been watching her aunt's face. "You have heard of him."

"Oh, my father! You really have!" cried Nuttie. "Then he really was on the desert island all this time; I was quite sure of it. How delightful!" She jumped up he was to blame."

"If he had been worth anything at all, he would have moved heaven and earth to find her!" cried Nuttie; "and you said yourself it was all that Mark's doing!"

"He seems to be a very upright and generous young man, that Mr. Mark Egremont," said Miss Headworth, a whole romance as to Nuttie's future destiny sweeping across her mind in an instant, with a mental dispensation to first cousins in such a case. "I think you will find him a staunch companion ever against his own interests."

Perceptions came across Nuttie. "Oh, then I am a sort of lost heiress, like people in a story! I see! But, Aunt Ursel, what do you think will happen?"

"My dear child, I cannot guess in the least. Perhaps the Egremont property will not concern you, and only go to male heirs. That would be the best thing, since in any case you must be sufficiently provided for. Your father must do that."

"But about mother?"

"A proper provision must be insisted on for her," said Miss Headworth. "It is no use, however, to speculate on the future. We cannot guess how Mr. Mark Egremont's communication will be received, or whether any wish will be expressed for your mother's rejoining your father. In such a case the terms must be distinctly understood, and I have full trust both in Mr. Mark and in Lady Kirkaldy as her champions to see that justice is done to you both."

"I'm sure he doesn't deserve that mother should go to him."

"Nor do I expect that he will wish it, or that it would be proper; but he is bound to give her a handsome maintenance, and I think most probably you will be asked to stay with your uncle and cousins," said Miss Headworth, figuring to herself a kind of Newstead Abbey or some such scene of constant orgies at Bridgefield Egremont.

"I shall accept nothing from the family that does not include mother," said Nuttie.

"Dear child, I foresee many trials, but you must be her protector."

"That I will," said Nuttie; and in the gallant purpose she went to bed, to find her mother either asleep or feigning slumber with tears on her cheek.

CHAPTER VI.

THE WATER-SOLDIER.

"Presumptuous maid, with looks intent,
Again she stretched, again she bent,
Nor knew the gulf between."—GRAY.

It all seemed like a dream to Ursula, perhaps likewise to her mother, when they rose to the routine of daily life with the ordinary interests of the day before them. There was a latent unwillingness in Mrs. Egremont's mind to discuss the subject with either aunt or daughter; and when the post brought no letter, Ursula, after a moment's sense of flatness, was relieved, and returned to her eager desire to hurry after the water-soldier. It was feasible that very afternoon. Mary Nugent came in with the intelligence.

"And can Gerard come? or shall we only look at it."

"Yes, Gerard can come, and so will Mr. Dutton," said Mary, who, standing about half-way between Mrs. Egremont and her daughter, did not think herself quite a sufficient chaperon.

"He will look on like a hen at her ducklings," said Nuttie. "It is cruel to take him, poor man!"

"Meantime, Nuttie, do you like an hour of Marie Stuart?"

"Oh, thank you!" But she whispered, "Aunt Ursel, may I tell her?"

"Ask your mother, my dear."

"Gently, gently, my dear," said Miss Mary, as the young people seemed very near a skirmish, and the train was sweeping up. Then there was another small scuffle, for Nuttie had set her heart on the third class; but Mr. Dutton had taken second-class tickets, and was about to hand them into a carriage whence there had just emerged a very supercilious black-moustached valet, who was pulling out a leather-covered dressing-case, while Gerard was consoling Nuttie by telling her that Monsieur never deigned to go third class.

"It is a smoking carriage," said Miss Nugent, on the step. "Pah! how it smells," as she jumped back.

"Beautiful backy—a perfect nosegay," said Gerard. "Trust that fellow for having the best."

"His master's, no doubt," suggested Mr. Dutton.

"You'd better go in it, to enjoy his reversion," said Nuttie.

"And where's my escort, then?"

"Oh, I'm sure we don't want you."

"Nuttie, my dear," expostulated Miss Nugent, dragging her into the next carriage.

"You may enjoy the fragrance still," said Nuttie when seated. "Do you see—there's the man's master; he has stood him up against that post, with his cigar, to wait while he gets out the luggage. I daresay you can get a whiff if you lean out far enough."

"I say! that figure is a study!" said Gerard. "What is it that he is so like?"

"Oh! I know," said Nuttie. "It is Lord Frederick Verisopht, and the bad gentlefolks in the pictures to the old numbers of Dickens that you have got, Miss Mary. Now, isn't he? Look! only Lord Frederick wasn't fat."

Nuttie was in a state of excitement that made her peculiarly unmanageable, and Miss Nugent was very grateful to Mr. Dutton for his sharp though general admonition against staring, while, under pretext of disposing of the umbrella and the vasculum, he stood up, so as to block the window till they were starting.

Too Late.

Mr. George Kennan, the Siberian traveller and writer, has been blacklisted by the Russian Government and will not be permitted to re-enter the Czar's dominions. "I expected, of course," says Mr. Kennan, "to be put on the Russian blacklist. I am only thankful that I succeeded in crossing the frontier with all my material and papers coming this way. The outside of the Russian frontier line is a good enough side for me at present. I became satisfied before I got half through Siberia that I should never be permitted to go there again, and that after the publication of my papers no other foreigner would be allowed to make investigations there, and I lost no possible opportunity to secure accuracy and thoroughness. I brought back more than fifty pounds of notes, papers and original documents, many of the latter from secret Government archives, besides 500 or 600 foolscap pages of manuscript prepared for me by political exiles in all parts of Siberia, and covering the most noteworthy episodes in their lives. I visited every convict mine in Siberia, and every convict prison except one, and I believe I know the exile system better than most officers of the exile administration, and far better than any outsider. I can regard the blacklisting, therefore, with a certain degree of complacency. The stable door is locked, but the horse has been stolen—and I've got him."

SCIENTIFIC AND USEFUL.

Tobacco, contrary to the common belief, does not destroy disease-germs. Smoking will not confer immunity from contagion.

Dr. Martineau, a French physician, asserts that carbonate of lithia and arseniate of soda in aerated water, used to the exclusion of other drinks, is almost infallible for diabetes.

It is popularly supposed that flame, or at least a temperature equal to the white or red heat of iron, is necessary to ignite benzene vapour, but this is a mistake. Friction can develop sufficient electricity to inflame benzene vapour, especially if the surface rubbed be very dry or varnished with shellac.

The locomotive is recommended as a cheap hygrometer for farmers and others living near railways. When the escaping steam remains long suspended the air is near its point of saturation with moisture; but, when the steam quickly disappears, as if swallowed up, the weather is dry, and there is little prospect of rain.

Should a horse refuse to drink, and cough after swallowing a little, it indicates sore-throat or swelling of the glands of the neck. It is one of the symptoms of distemper. Give the horse a warm bran mash, with one drachm of chlorate of potash in it, daily for a week or ten days. There is nothing serious to be apprehended.

When milk is slowly and partially frozen, the ice takes up the greater part of the cream; the unfrozen remainder contains the casein, milk, sugar, and salts, but, in consequence of its loss of cream, appears like diluted milk, and would be described as such if merely tested by the ordinary lactometric instrument. Milk which has been frozen should therefore be well thawed and shaken up, and not sold whilst any ice is visible.

Polish suitable for polishing pianos: A fine varnish is made as follows. Take seven hundred parts of alcohol, fifteen parts of copal, seven parts of gum-arabic, and thirty parts of shellac. The resins are first pulverised and bolted through a piece of muslin, the powder is placed in a flask, the alcohol poured over it, and the flask corked. By putting the flask in a moderately warm place, the solution will be accomplished in two or three days. It is then strained through muslin and kept in hermetically sealed bottles.

Coal-ashes are of some value as a fertiliser, especially to mix with clayey soil. But the use to make of the ashes is for roads and paths. A good covering, over which a little soil is thrown, will soon form a hard solid road. To make a better walk, prepare and level the bed, excavating it a few inches below the general surface. Pour on a coating of coal-tar and cover it thickly with coal-ashes. When this is dry, repeat with another coat of tar and ashes, and so on, until there are four coats of tar and as many of ashes. In a short time this will harden and make a walk as hard as stone.

Sir Charles Dilke's Reception by the Sultan.

Sir Charles Dilke, on his recent visit to Constantinople, did not expect to see the Sultan, and declined to ask for an audience. He was [illegible]ore, agreeably surprised to receive a visit from an imperial chamberlain, who made an offer to Sir Charles, in the Sultan's name, of the Grand Cordon of the Medjidie, and to Lady Dilke of the Chefakat.

He also signified that a private audience would be granted to Sir Charles, who naturally availed himself of this favor, and remained a long time with Abdul Hamid. At the close of the audience the Sultan expressed a wish to make the acquaintance of Lady Dilke, and said: "Come and dine here

PLEADING WITH A SAVAGE KING.

Efforts of the English to Stop the Terrible Angoni Raids.

Many years ago a large number of adventuresome Zulus left their own country and travelled hundreds of miles north, until they reached the region of Lake Nyassa. There they settled and multiplied, some of them making their homes among the highlands west of the big lake, and others travelling around the north end of the lake and settling on the northeast side of it. They still wear on their heads the ring that denotes a Zulu warrior and they speak the Zulu language in a corrupted form. They are the best fighters of the Nyassa region and have long been the terror of all the other tribes living around the lake. They travel with great celerity, and sometimes go a hundred miles or more on slave and cattle stealing raids. Large regions have been almost wholly depopulated by these terrible raids, and the remnants of several once prosperous tribes are now living on mountain tops eking out a most miserable existence, and never free from the fear that their enemies will seek them out, even in the fastnesses to which they have retreated.

Ever since Livingston first visited the Nyassa region we have heard of these terrible Angoni west of the lake. Every year the missionaries at Blantyre, south of Lake Nyassa, have sent home reports of Angoni raids in the fertile districts around them. Several missionaries have visited them, and two years ago Mr. Montagu Kerr, formerly a Wall street broker, spent some time in their chief town and wrote an entertaining descripton of these remarkable people. It has long been evident that unless their raids were stopped the work of depopulation would go on until thousands of square miles were swept clear of inhabitants.

The pitiful reports sent to England by the missionaries induced the British Government recently to send Mr. Hawes, the English-Consul in the Nyassa territory, to the King of the Angoni, to see if he could not be persuaded to give up his terrible raids. The King was notified that the representative of a great Queen was coming to see him, and he recieved Consul Hawes with much display of good will and with all the honors he could render. He told Mr. Hawes that he wished to live on good terms with the English, and he said that as far as Angoni were concerned he would guarantee the safety of all the missionary stations. He was not quite so ready to promise to discontinue his incursions among the tribes south and east of the great lake, but after many discussions of the matter he finally promised that his warriors should not cross the Shire River, through which the waters of Nyassa pour into the Zambesi. It remains to be seen whether his promise is worth anything. If he keeps his word, a very large district in one of the fairest parts of Africa that was once the home of a large and comparatively peaceful population, will in future be spared the terrible Angoni raids. It is in this region that the African Lakes Company has opened some coffee plantations, and quite a number of white men are there engaged in missionary and commercial pursuits.

Mr. Hawes says that the Angoni yield the most implicit obedience to the commands of their King, and he was impressed by the great consideration the King and all his officers received from their people.

Mr. Frith, R. A., in his recently-published autobiography, has an interesting reminiscence of the Princess of Wales. When painting her portrait, he describes himself as reduced to despair through discovering

THE LIME-KILN CLUB.

"If I war' to lib my life over agin I should seek to be a philosopher," said Brother Gardner, as the thermometer marked ninety-eight degrees in Paradise Hall. "I has spent a good sheer of de las' sixty y'ars fightin' philosophy, an' feel dat it has been de wuss fur me. If I had de chance to begin all ober agin, I should do differently.

"As a baby, I should reason dat de mo' I slept de faster I would grow, an' de faster I growed de sooner I'd get beyand babyhood.

"As a child, I should reason dat bumps, thumps, falls an' heart-aches war' a part an' parcel of my lot, an' de mo' I had of 'em de tuffer I would grow.

"As a youth, I'd take a bit of chalk an figger up dat I'd git about so many lickin's a week—hev about so many fights wid de boys—l'arn about so much rascality—be disappointed about so often.

"As a young man, I'd figger dat de world was heah bcfo' I was heard of; dat I'd be stepped on about twice a week; dat I couldn't reform nobody nor nuthin'; dat de mo' anxious I was to upsot things de mo' shoe-leather I'd wear out; dat de churches could be left to de preachers, an' de guv'ment to de pollytishuns.

"As an ole man I'd feel dat what is ar' all right. Let us now purceed wid de reg'lar order of bizness."

NOT ENCOURAGED.

The Secretary announced a communication from the Hon. Gigback Taylor, a resident of one of the suburbs of Montgomery, Ala., known as "Vesuvius," stating his readiness to journey to Detroit and appear before the club and deliver his lecture on: "Is the world Growing Badder—She Is." He didn't want to make any money out of the club, and would, therefore, come if all his expenses were paid and he was presented with a pair of two-shilling suspenders when he left for home.

Pickles Smith, who had his wheelbarrow stolen the other day, and, consequently, believes in the badness of the world, moved that the terms of the speaker be accepted, but the President waved him aside and said:

"We kin not incouraige de Hon. gem'lan to put in an appearance. In de fust place de price am too high; in de next place, if de world am growin' badder we can't help it, an' his lecktur' won't make it any better. 'deed, I can't accept his conclushun at all. Now an' den some one may break into my hen-coop, pizen my dog or stick me wid a lead nickle, but de world in gineral can't be held to blame fur it. I believe we ar' growin' better—much better."

A VAIN APPEAL.

Some time since the branch club at Halifax bounced a member named Limited Johnson for having declared his belief that the world was flat. He was given every opportunity to retract and change his opinions, but he positively refused to do so. When his name was erased from the books he made an appeal to the home club to be reinstated. This appeal was referred to the Committee on Astronomy for investiga-mained a long time with Abdul Hamid. At the close of the audience the Sultan expressed a wish to make the acquaintance of Lady Dilke, and said: "Come and dine here with her on Monday, at sunset."

Sir Charles could not accept the Medjidie, but his wife wore the Turkish order in going to the dinner, which was served at 6. A band played in an adjoining hall. The chief civil and military officers of the Sultan were at table. The imperial host had been told that Lady Dilke was an authoress, and he informed her that he meant to get her "Shrine of Death" translated into Turkish.

When the English guests were leaving, the Sultan took up a small packet which he asked Sir Charles to accept, "though of no intrinsic value, it contained some views of Constantinople." When it was opened at the hotel, the packet was found to contain a gold cigarette-box, with enamelled views of Constantinople set in brilliants. An irade was also given to enable Sir Charles and Lady Dilke to see the treasure and the palaces; and, if it did not, said the Father of the Faithful, cover everything, further facilities would be granted.

The Vicar-General called on Sir Charles and his wife to express the desire of the Greek Patriarch to see them. They were received by him, attended by the Synod, containing seven Archbishops. The Patriarch gave his visitors his blessing, telling them when he did so how "truly glad and deeply moved he was at receiving one who had done so much for the Greek cause." Finally, they were shown the relics of St. Chrysostom and the treasure of the Greek Church.

Mastodons Said to be Still Alive in Alaska.

In conversation with D. H. Summers, formerly of Denver, Col., who came out this fall with a party of miners from Forty Mile Creek, we learned that the existence of living mastodons as not the mere fabrications of Northern furriers, but that the Stick Indians had positively told him that such animals had been seen by them. One of the Indians said that while hunting one day in that unknown section he came across an immense track sunk to a depth of several inches in moss. It much resembled an elephant's track but was larger round than a barrel. The Indian followed up this curious track, which to all appearance was very fresh, tracking from one immense stride to another, a distance of some miles, when he came in full view of his game. The hunter gave one look, then turned and fled. These Indians as a rule, are the bravest hunters. With no other weapon than their spear they will attack and kill a grizzly, but the immense proportions of this new style of game both startled and filled the hunter, brave as he was, with fear. He described it as being larger than Post Trader Harper's store, with great shining yellowish tusks and a mouth large enough to swallow him at a single gulp. He said the animal was doubtless similar to those which furnished the immense bones scattered over that section. If such animals are now in existence, and Mr. Summers has no reason to doubt the veracity of the Indian, as other Indians, and also Mr. Harper confirmed it, they inhabit a section very high in altitude, but rarely visited by human beings. We have also no reason to doubt the Indian tale, for at no very distant period Yukeon country was inhabited by these animals, as hundreds of their massive skeletons strewn along the creeks are silent but truthful witnesses. On Forty Mile Creek bones can be found projecting partly from the sand and among the driftwood of the stream on the creek below this these skre also eletons, quite numerous.

ed autobiography, has an interesting reminiscence of the Princess of Wales. When painting her portrait, he describes himself as reduced to despair through discovering that the illustrious young lady did not know that the keeping her face in one position was necessary to enable an artist to catch a resemblance of it. "That first sitting can I ever forget? I did not dare to complain till after two or three more fruitless attempts. With downright failure staring me in the face, I opened my heart to the Prince of Wales. 'You should scold her, said the Prince. Just at this time the Princess was sitting for her bust to the celebrated sculptor Gibson, R. A., in a room at Marlborough House. I was sent for by the Prince, and, before I was admitted to an interview, I was shown into the sculptor's studio, and found him waiting for a sitting from the Princess. The bust was already in an advanced stage. I did not think it was very like, and, in reply to Gibson, said so. 'Well, you see," said Gibson, 'the Princess is a delighful lady; but she can't sit a bit." Just at this moment I was summoned to the Prince, whom I found with the Princess; and I saw, or thought I saw, a sort of pretty smiling pout, eloquent of reproof and of half-anger with me. The Prince had something to show me—photographs, I think—and then he led the way to Gibson, the Princess and I following. No sooner did we find ourselves in the sculptor's presence than—after some remarks upon the bust—the Prince said, 'How do you find the Princess sit, Mr. Gibson?" 'Now,' thought I, 'if ever man was in an awkward fix, you are, Mr. Gibson; for, after what you said to me a few minutes ago, you cannot, in my presence, compliment the beautiful model on her sitting.' The Prince looked at Gibson, and Gibson looked in dead silence at the Prince, and then at the Princess; he then looked again at the Prince, smiled, and shook his head. 'There, you see—you sit properly neither to Mr. Gibson nor to Mr. Frith." 'I do—I do!' said the lady. "You are two bad men!" After this however all smiled, and everything went well.

Mr. Jones—"Could you, do you think—er—bring me a glass of ice water?"

made an appeal to the home club to be reinstated. This appeal was referred to the Committee on Astronomy for investigation and report, and the Chairman now reported:

"When a pusson stands in de middle of a cotton field an' squints dis way an' dat way it 'pears to him dat de world am flat. We doan' blame Brudder Johnson for believin' his eyes, but we blame him fur not believin' in geography. Geography says de world am round. All the white folks say so. All de intelligent cull'ud people say so. It's sartin den dat de world am round. A member of a lodge dat believes otherwise wouldn't stop dar. He'd soon assert dat de world wobbled instead of turned, an' dat de moon was hung up dar' on purpose to make onions grow at night. He'd keep de lodge stirred up and everybody mad, an' de result kin easily be predicted. De offishul appeal of Limited Johnson to be reinstaten am, darfo' denied, an' de ackshun of de Halifax branch in droppin' him from de rolls is sustained by a large majority."

On motion of Trustee Pullback the report was accepted and adopted.

LESS PREACHING—MORE WORK.

A communication from the Rev. Moses Green, of Franklin, Ky., was then announced. The Rev. Green stated that he was a preacher in search of a flock, and wanted to know what the chances were in the North. The ranks were not only overcrowded in the South, but the recompense in dollars and cents was so small that colored preachers had the hardest kind of work to live and maintain their dignity.

"I reckon dat's a fackt," said Brother Gardner as he scanned the communication. "De Seckretary will answer him kindly but firmly. Let him be informed dat dar' am no vacancies in de No'th, an' let him understand dat it am our advice dat he orter preach les an' work mo'. If ebery cull'd man in de South who feels dat he orter preach could make a libin' dat way dar' wouldn't be 'nuff folks left to chop out de cotton an' hoe de co'n. Dar's too much preachin' and too many preachers down dar'. A reasonable amount of religion am a good thing to hev, an' none of us should neglect it, but between two services on Sunday, two prayer-meetin's a week, de Saturday holiday an' gwine to de depot in de mawnin' an' to de postoffis at night, de cull'd brudder south of de Ohio Riber has got about all he kin attend to. It mought not be a bad thing fur him to drop some of his religun, an' fur seberal thousand preachers to pick up de hoe an' go to work."

PROGRESSING SATISFACTORILY.

Whalebone Howker then secured the floor to make an inquiry. He wanted to know if the fishery dispute with Canada had yet been settled. He hadn't had a good night's sleep since the talk of war, and his wife had quit buying fish with a Canadian look around the gills for fear they had been poisoned by the enemy.

"De Chair am happy to state in reply," said the President, "dat de matter am under advisement an' progressin' in a satisfactory manner. Dar' won't be any fout between dis kentry an' Canada, an' de time am not fur distant when de Yankee an' de Canuck will once mo' sit on de same log an' spit on deir bait in unison. Let us go home."

Miss Clara Noon, who teaches school at Sabina, Ohio, caught a pupil in a falsehood, and, to punish him for lying, scrubbed out his mouth with soap and water. The boy's parents objected to this form of punishment and preferred charges. The trustees, after a bitter trial, upheld the young schoolmarm.

DEFEATING DEATH.

A STORY OF FAR WESTERN LIFE.

"Good-bye, John; take good care of yourself and come back as soon as you can."

"Good-bye, Nellie, dear, and don't forget me while I am away."

Their hands warmly pressed each other as their lips would have done had not others been near. Then they separated. Nellie Browning watched the tall, strong form of John King until it was lost in the high grass of the prairie and with a sigh returned to duty.

Never before had the little isolated way station on the Canadian Pacific seemed so dull, the clink of the telegraph instrument so monotonous. There was literally nothing for her to do after the customary "putting to rights." No train would pass for hours, messages seldom troubled her, she had exhausted her little stock of reading. What could she do to make the hours pass less wearily?

She rested her head upon the key-board and gave herself to pleasant waking dreams, to mentally following her lover and murmuring aloud of the pictures thought photographed upon her heart.

"It will take John all day to inspect the line to the little wooden island in the middle of the prairie, and he will have to sleep there alone in the log cabin. I wonder if he will think of me all the time, as I will of him? How I wish I could be with him!"

But do what she would her thoughts wandered to her lover, the lack of comfort he would experience, and the happy day when she would have the right to be ever by his side.

As if the hours had become leaden-footed they crept along. At noon she listlessly ate the lunch she had brought from her farm home; then wished night would hurry along that she might be with her lover, at least in dreams.

Darkness did come after long and weary waiting; her hours of duty had ended and she was preparing to leave when the station was called and she was told in clicking whispers that on account of an extra that was wildcatting she would have to remain until midnight.

With the reverse of a pleasant expression upon her face and an almost defiant tossing back of her auburn curls she sat down again. The workmen about the station went home and left her alone; the frogs croaked mournfully from a neighboring slough and the wires made weird music as the brisk night wind played upon them. But the experience was not new to her; there was nothing to fear and her father would come for her when the night was done.

Eight, nine, ten passed and the silence was becoming painful. Something must be done. She failed to remember being so much oppressed by the lack of society and wondered how Robinson Crusoe could have existed before his man Friday. Then she thought of a female friend who was operator at the next westward station, and, nearly dying for some one to talk to, summoned "Sterling."

There was no reply. Try as she would directly she could get none, but utilizing a circuit she was answered and asked:

"What is the matter with the main line?"

"Matter enough," was answered, and her trained ear instantly told her the touch was not of a delicately fingered girl, but a heavy-handed man. "The prairie is all on fire between here and Buffalo Heart Grove; that is beginning to burn and when the thread of beaten earth, with fire swiftly rushing toward it from either side.

The horse, brave and blooded as he was, hesitated, as well he might; but the hand of the rider was firm and the whip merciless. A brief hour had transformed the gentle girl into a woman maddened by love and superior to danger. The one idea that had taken possession of brain and pulsing heart remained permanent. John King was in danger of being consumed. She must him save or—

And very soon the horse became mad as well. With long and seemingly tireless strides he stretched himself. His dark skin was flecked with foam, his sides were heaving as a bellows, like escaping steam his breath was blown, his eyes were red with exertion and his frame trembling with excitement.

On, on they pressed, on thus far in little danger, for the fire was yet at a distance. But with every moment it became nearer, nearer, closed upon them, and blazing sparks fell thick as rain.

On, on, and the flames leaped upward and at times closed over their heads; they were rushing as through a tunnel of hissing, roaring fire; it was crowding in upon them, was beneath their feet, was playing in fantastic shapes around and above.

Mad as the girl was with desire to reach her lover the horrors of the situation were forced upon her brain. She bowed her head to the firey storm, shielded her face and often extinguished her blazing dress; spoke encouragingly to the horse, patted his quivering neck, used the deep-cutting lash, cutting a hundred times more cruelly, for his sides were cracking with the heat and blood was oozing from the blistered wounds.

On, still on, but more slowly at every stride, with steps less firm and secure, breath more scant, courage less high and pace less swift. Never yet steed that could long bear such a fearful strain; never flesh that could resist a prairie fire with hundreds of acres of dry, tall grass and reeds for fuel and fanned by a gale.

On! The girl shielded her eyes with her trembling hands, and above the smoke saw the waving of trees. As yet the furious fire had not reached, at least not penetrated, them. There was life, safety, and, more than all, love. Could she reach them? A scanty half mile had yet to be travelled. Instinct, often as clear to discovery as mind, told the horse of the situation as clearly as her eyes. She called upon him, and he answered; she bowed to the saddle, she shut her eyes and then!

The flames swirled around, they were wrapped as in a winding sheet of them, the red forked tongues touched them with blistering kisses, the wind roared through the gigantic furnace, the earth was hot beneath, the air burning above; deer, wolf, every creeping thing were outfooted in the race, were beaten down by a swift death, and how could they possibly escape.

On! Between them and the sheltering trees but a few rods remained; but a few feet. Could they be overcome? Voice and lash urged the noble horse on. He struggled to obey, but his best efforts were becoming feebler, his heart was beating slow, the iron-muscled limbs were fast becoming useless. A single burst of speed, as at the beginning would have been enough—the racing of a few seconds all that was required.

Frantically the girl shouted, in despair she lashed the reeking sides. The horse gathered for a supreme effort, reeled, staggered, fell even as the wind roared and the fire hissed more savagely.

But the impulse had been sufficient to

The boys on an English reform ship in the Mersey mutinied recently, and for several hours were in possession of the ship. They smashed the furniture and did a great deal of damage, after which seventeen of the worst ringleaders lowered a boat and escaped to the shore. Some of them were recaptured.

Senorita Matilde Montoya is the first Mexican girl to become a doctor. A committee of young men of the City of Mexico got up a bull fight in honor of her courage, and devoted the proceeds to the purchase of books and instruments for her. In the bull fight two of the toreros were hurt, one of them seriously.

A Hungarian historian, rummaging through the archives at Buda-Pesth, discovered over 500 wills dated between 1802 and 1874, which had been put away so safely that they had been lost sight of, and the estates to which they related have been treated as though the persons making them had died intestate. A dreadful crop of lawsuits is expected to follow.

Then she dashed out where all should have been darkness but was not. For miles earth and sky were illuminated, the roaring of the flames could be distinctly heard, their furious leaping distinctly traced, their speed swifter than the greyhound and their force resistless as a cyclone. One life she knew was in danger, and that was to her more than all others in the world.
